Foreword

In 1933, when the National Park Service, the American Institute of Architects, and the Library of Congress first joined together to create the Historic American Buildings Survey, this nation was in the midst of its greatest economic crisis. Franklin Delano Roosevelt's administration, promising a "New Deal" to a people buffeted as well by the winds of social and political change, launched many public works programs to offer immediate relief to thousands of unemployed Americans. These efforts produced many things of lasting value, including improvements to our great system of national parks, vast public works construction projects, and creative efforts as various as the Federal Writers' Program, the Federal Theatre Project, and the Index of American Design. Of all these programs begun in the 1930s, however, only the Historic American Buildings Survey continues today.

It was natural that a troubled nation should look toward its past in such a time, and there can be no more tangible evidence of a people's aspirations and accomplishments than its material culture. As we saw examples of our characteristic buildings, both great and humble, slip out of memory without record, we recognized a collective loss. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, we began to look at what our immigrant civilization had built in little more than three centuries, and at what native American cultures had produced still earlier.

The Historic American Buildings Survey was our first national attempt to preserve this heritage through graphic and written records of our built environment. Perhaps the Survey's major innovation, however, was a standard format designed to facilitate the study and use of its records. This concern for public accessibility combined with the Survey's scope to make the collection democratic in both intent and content. At first, the Survey put unemployed architects to work; since, it has trained generations of architectural students, historians, photographers, and others in historic principles of design and construction. From the beginning it has provided a resource for writers, researchers, and scholars in many fields. Countless publications have drawn upon its images and records, copies of which are now widely available in this country and abroad. The National Park Service, the American Institute of Architects, and the Library of Congress are all justifiably proud of their participation in this rewarding effort.

The idea which led to all of this began in the National Park Service, in the mind of the chief of the Eastern Division of its Branch of Plans and Design, a man then in his twenties. In the fall of 1933 Charles E. Peterson recognized the opportunity to employ jobless architects to record a vanishing architectural patrimony. He seized upon the moment and convinced his superior, Arthur E. Demaray, of the feasibility of such a program. With that support he enlisted the cooperation of the American Institute of Architects (AIA), through Edward C. Kemper, and the Library of Congress, with the help of Leicester B. Holland. Besides securing initial funding, Peterson recruited the original staff to produce the Survey's records. Meanwhile, Holland, chief of the Library's Fine Arts Division and chairman of the American Institute of Architects Committee on Preservation of Historic Buildings, adapted an existing system at the Library of Congress to receive and arrange those records for public use.

Work began late in 1933 under the direction of Thomas C. Vint, and a national advisory committee was convened in January 1934 by William Graves Perry, head of the firm noted for its architectural work at Colonial Williamsburg. The tripartite agreement among the National Park Service, the American Institute of Architects, and the Library of Congress, under which the Survey has since operated, became effective on July 23 of the same year. The program received its legislative mandate through the Historic Sites, Buildings, and Antiquities Act of 1935, reaffirmed by the Historic Preservation Act of 1980. To this day, the original partners continue in a productive and unparalleled cooperative venture that includes both the public and the private sector.

In May 1981 representatives from the Park Service, the AIA, and the Library met to discuss how they might mark a half century of effort. To most of those present it was evident that no commemorative publication could be more appropriate or useful than a complete listing of the HABS records. The last HABS national catalog, published in 1941, was woefully out of date, even taking into account its supplement of 1959. The state catalog series was incomplete, and no thorough published account of the thousands of sites and structures documented since 1960 existed. It was also felt that a group of essays showing the range and effect of the Survey's recording activities and the potential its records offered for study and analysis would provide a useful complement to such an inventory.

We hope that this checklist and commentary expand still further the usefulness of a great collection, making more people aware of its existence and its possibilities. Just as the Historic American Buildings Survey and its companion program, the Historic American Engineering Record, will continue to provide a training ground for students and historians of architecture, the records these agencies create will serve as evidence of our built heritage and as a resource for those who would draw from it. We invite you to use and enjoy the rich store of information that has been created during the past half century.

Acknowledgments

This publication would be noteworthy under any circumstances, but when one considers that it was produced in less than twenty months—and as a cooperative venture—its timely appearance is the more remarkable. Many people gave tirelessly in order to make it happen, and we take this opportunity to thank them. They included the professional and support staff at the National Park Service (NPS), particularly in the offices of the Historic American Buildings Survey and the Historic American Engineering Record (HABS/HAER), at the American Institute of Architects, and at the Library of Congress, where the Prints and Photographs Division worked hand in hand with the Publishing Office, which coordinated the entire effort. The interns who helped to create the checklist and the authors of the essays deserve special thanks for their hard and excellent work accomplished under a demanding schedule.

Between May and July of 1981, staff from the National Park Service, the Library of Congress, and the American Institute of Architects and others met and determined the particular sort of publication that would best mark the fiftieth anniversary of the Historic American Buildings Survey. Participants in those meetings included Mary Lou Grier, Deputy Director of the National Park Service; Jerry Rogers, Associate Director of the National Park Service; Ernest Connally, former Associate Director of the National Park Service; Robert Kapsch, Alicia Stamm, Kenneth Anderson, John Burns, Isabel Hill, Allen Chambers, Carolyn Pitts, Pat Cejka, Jan Cigliano, and others from the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record staff; John Peterson and John Ritterhoff from the NPS Data Systems Division; Maurice Payne, Michael Cohn, Richard van Os Keuls, John McCune, and Bruce Judd of the American Institute of Architects; and Alan Fern, Oliver Jensen, Dana J. Pratt, Evelyn Sinclair, C. Ford Peatross, and Mary M. Ison of the Library of Congress. Russell Keune of the National Trust for Historic Preservation, former HABS Chief James Massey, and HABS founder Charles Peterson also took part. Almost without exception the participants agreed that a comprehensive inventory of the sites and structures recorded by the Survey was the most urgent need that could be met for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary. It was suggested that such a listing would be more useful if accompanied by a group of essays illuminating the nature and uses of the HABS records. It was also decided that sites and structures documented by the Survey's sister program, the Historic American Engineering Record, should be included in the inventory.

After these early meetings, the HABS/HAER Division began investigating what had to be done to develop a useful inventory and what resources would be required. The first feasibility study was undertaken in the autumn of 1981 by intern Anne Bisceglia under the direction of HABS/HAER archivist Alicia Stamm and with technical assistance from John Peterson and Robert Kapsch. It focused on one state—Massachusetts—and yielded much valuable information, demonstrating some difficulties and problems that could be resolved. An improved approach was tested on five states in the spring of 1982.

By May 1982 it was apparent that HABS/HAER would have to undertake a crash program to develop a computerized inventory by the fall of 1982 so that a book could be published by November 1983. Appropriated funds were not available, and National Park Service Associate Director Jerry Rogers and Division Chief Robert Kapsch decided to hire student interns to work over the summer and to use special contracts and funds donated to the HABS/HAER Division, an approach approved by National Park Service Deputy Director Mary Lou Grier. Alicia Stamm was selected as program leader.

In a very short time, ten summer interns were hired and trained, thousands of index cards recording existing HABS/HAER data were reproduced, thousands of data input sheets were duplicated for data entry use, and contracts were negotiated and equipment and supplies procured. Besides the obvious task of entering thousands of HABS/HAER records into the computer system, HABS and HAER numbers had to be checked and corrected, property names had to verified, standard codes had to be developed and assigned, and numerous other tasks had to be completed.

Special thanks go to the ten interns on the team Alicia Stamm had assembled by June 1982. Anne Bisceglia, Kristin Cleaver, Kevin Darken, Janet Gwaltney, Martha Hagedorn, Daithi Houlihan, Lisa Mausolf, Katherine Penovich, Sharman Roberts, and Michael Sullivan and Susan McCown of the HABS staff worked together to make computer entries identifying HABS/ HAER records for almost seventeen thousand sites and structures in the United States and its territories and possessions. The first data entry was made on June 22, 1982, and the monumental task was completed by September 30, 1982. This achievement would not have been possible without the help of the Mini Computers Branch of the Data Systems Division of the National Park Service. We gratefully acknowledge the contributions of Glenn Schumaker, John Peterson, Shirley Huffman, Sheila Smith, Keith Carr, and Mae Williams. In addition, the firm Automated Sciences Group provided data input services under contract to the National Park Service. Of particular assistance from that staff were Theodore Ferguson, Brenda Young, and Scott McGilvrey.

Meanwhile, Ford Peatross at the Library of Congress brought together a roster of fifteen authors for the illustrated essays. All had made use of the Survey's work or participated in it, each in a different way, and they seemed pleased to have an opportunity to acknowledge the collection's potential. Charles E. Peterson, Richard Allen, and Samuel Wilson were familiar with certain aspects of the Survey since its beginnings. Peterson knew its history and mission. Allen recognized the Survey's particular role in documenting—and encouraging others to record—the covered bridge, and Wilson had participated in the Survey's substantial work in his own state, Louisiana. George Tatum's intimate knowledge of the city of Philadelphia recommended him for an essay on that city. A narrowing focus tightened still further with Rodris Roth's analysis of a room, the kitchen, and with Peter Myers's delightful examination of miscellaneous details in Survey photographs. Carl Lounsbury, Margot Gayle, and David De Long looked at the collection from the vantage point of their own particular specialities in construction, materials, and design. Carolyn Pitts and Carole Rifkind drew upon their knowledge of the active role which the Survey has played in the revitalization of historic districts. John Burns, Robert Bruegmann, and Robert Kapsch, all familiar with the recording process, examined its nature, problems, and potential. The editor discussed the interrelationship of HABS with kindred architectural resources at the Library of Congress.

The publishing of the book was undertaken by the Publishing Office of the Library of Congress, under the direction of Dana J. Pratt. Evelyn Sinclair coordinated the publication of both essays and checklist, and Johanna Craig supervised the book's production according to an unrelenting timetable. Michael Seyfrit, on special contract, wrote the program that allowed the magnetic tape of the checklist provided by the Park Service to be adapted for use in setting the type for the book.

Many other offices and individuals at the Library of Congress contributed to this effort. In the Prints and Photographs Division, former chief Oliver Jensen, Robert Lisbeth, Carol Johnson, Doris Lee, Roberta Phillips, Kermit Klouser, and Gail Markowitz assisted in various ways. Mary Ison provided reference assistance to many of the authors, carefully reviewed the checklist, and provided the introductory essay on the use of the collection. Marita Stamey and the staff of the Photoduplication Service provided photographic prints for the book's illustrations.

Without these contributions, this book would not have been possible. We thank each of those who participated in this special effort to commemorate fifty years of the Historic American Buildings Survey. Historic America is your invitation to this nation's rich history in architecture, design, and engineering, a built heritage to take pride in, to learn from, to preserve, and to explore.

RICHARD SANDERS ALLEN is an engineering historian, retired from the New York State Education Department, Albany, New York 12230. Since 1937 he has researched early American bridge building, later embracing other fields, such as American iron manufacture, coastal fortifications, commercial aviation of 1920–40, and the aircraft used in the Spanish Civil War of 1936–39. Among his books are Covered Bridges of the Northeast (Brattleboro, Vt., 1957; rev. ed., 1974), Covered Bridges of the South (Brattleboro, Vt., 1970), Covered Bridges of the Middle West (Brattleboro, Vt., 1970), and Revolution in the Sky (Brattleboro, Vt., 1974).

ROBERT BRUEGMANN is Associate Professor in the History of Architecture and Art Department, University of Illinois at Chicago, Chicago, Illinois 60680. He is the author of Benicia, Portrait of an Early California Town (San Francisco, 1980), a forthcoming book on the Chicago architectural firm Holabird and Roche/Holabird and Root, and numerous articles and exhibition catalog essays on European and American modern architecture. He worked for the Historic American Buildings Survey and the Historic American Engineering Record in the 1970s.

JOHN A. BURNS, A.I.A., is an architect with the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record, National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. 20240. He specializes in architectural documentation and has lectured and published on the architectural technology of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century especially. With his wife, Deborah Burns, an architectural historian, he wrote "The Bauhaus As You've Never Seen It," AIA Journal (July 1981), about the restoration of the Bauhaus building in Dessau, East Germany. For the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, he wrote Energy Conserving Features Inherent in Older Homes (Washington, 1982). His architectural photographs have been published in numerous periodicals and shown at the AIA's Octagon House in the exhibit "Le Corbusier in Paris" in 1975.

DAVID G. DE LONG is Associate Professor of Architecture and Chairman of the Division of Historic Preservation at Columbia University, New York, New York 10027. His publications include The Architecture of Bruce Goff; Buildings and Projects, 1916–1974 (New York and London, 1977) and fourteen volumes of Historic American Buildings (New York and London, 1979–80), compiled from the Historic American Buildings Survey materials for New York, Texas, and California.

MARGOT GAYLE is a preservationist and a writer. She is president and founder of Friends of Cast Iron Architecture, a national organization devoted to the preservation of architectural and decorative ironwork. She is author of Cast Iron Architecture in New York (New York, 1974) and coauthor of Metals in America's Historic Buildings (Washington, 1980). She provided historical introductions to reprints of two classic foundry trade catalogs: Badger's Illustrated Catalogue of Cast Iron Architecture (New York, 1981) and Victorian Ironwork: The Wickersham Catalogue of 1857 (Philadelphia, 1977). Mrs. Gayle has lectured on cast-iron architecture in many parts of the country and written on the subject for several magazines, including a regular column on "Changing New York" in the New York Daily News Sunday magazine. As a preservationist, she has helped save many buildings in the SOHO Cast-Iron Historic District in Manhattan and elsewhere. She has worked with the Planning Commission of New York City and as a staff writer for CBS.

MARY M. ISON is a Reference Specialist for the Architecture, Design, and Engineering Collections in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. 20540. She is responsible for reference services for the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record and related collections, and she edits the quarterly COPAR (Cooperative Preservation of Architectural Records) Newsletter. She has published articles and book reviews in the Special Libraries Association's Picturescope and the Quarterly Journal of the Library of Congress and has spoken about the Library's architectural collections before various groups.

ROBERT J. KAPSCH is Chief of the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record Division of the National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. 20240. A veteran of nineteen years of service in a variety of management positions at several building-related federal agencies in Washington, he is a graduate engineer with degrees in management, American studies, and engineering and architecture. He has published a number of articles on architectural and engineering documentation as well as on other aspects of architectural and engineering practice.

CARL LOUNSBURY is an architectural historian in the Architectural Research Department of the Colonial Williamsburg Foundation, Williamsburg, Virginia 23187. His background is in American studies. He has conducted fieldwork in vernacular architecture in North Carolina and Virginia and is a participant in the Friends of Friendless Farmbuildings as well as a member of the board of directors of the Vernacular Architecture Forum. His publications include The Architecture of Southport (Southport, N.C., 1979), "The Development of Domestic Architecture in the Albemarle Region" in Carolina Dwelling: Towards Preservation of Place (Raleigh, N.C., 1978), edited by Doug Swaim, and "The Building Process in Antebellum North Carolina" in the North Carolina Historical Review (1983). He is coauthor with Charlotte Brown and Catherine Bishir of the forthcoming book Architects and Builders in North Carolina.

DENYS PETER MYERS is an architectural historian on the staff of the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record, National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. 20240. He is the author of Maine Catalog: The Historic Architecture of Maine (Augusta, Maine, 1974) and Gaslighting in America—A Guide for Historic Preservation (Washington, 1978) and a contributor to Maine Forms of American Architecture (Camden, Maine, 1976), edited by Deborah Thompson, and the Macmillan Encyclopedia of Architects (New York and London, 1982), as well as to a number of scholarly journals. A former art museum director in Ohio, Oklahoma, and Iowa and assistant director of the Baltimore Museum of Art, he taught at Johns Hopkins University and the Catholic University of America before joining HABS/HAER in 1966. His special field of interest is material culture of the nineteenth century.

C. FORD PEATROSS is Curator of the Architecture, Design, and Engineering Collections in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. 20540. With a background in business administration and the history of art, he is particularly interested in the history of architecture and its documentation. He has spoken before many groups concerning the Cooperative Preservation of Architectural Records (COPAR) and serves on the Historic Resources Committee of the American Institute of Architects, the Executive Committee of the International Confederation of Architectural Museums, and the Advisory Board of the Art and Architecture Thesaurus Project. His publications include the exhibition catalog William Nichols, Architect (University, Ala., 1979), "Architectural Collections in the Library of Congress," Quarterly Journal of the Library of Congress (July 1977), reprinted in Graphic Sampler (Washington, 1979), and contributions to the Macmillan Encyclopedia of Architects (New York and London, 1982) and the quarterly COPAR Newsletter.

CHARLES E. PETERSON, F.A.I.A., is a registered architect practicing out of Society Hill, Philadelphia 19106. After graduating from the University of Minnesota in 1928 and qualifying in the California examination for National Park Service Landscape Architect, he entered on duty at the San Francisco field headquarters. Transferred to the East to pioneer new historical and architectural programs, he was in charge of routine planning from the Acadia Park (Maine) to the Great Smokies (North Carolina to Tennessee) and Hot Springs (Arkansas). His last government posts were as Resident Architect of the Independence Park (Philadelphia, 1950–56) and Supervising Architect, Historic Structures (in the East, 1956–62). He has fought on the bloody barricades of local preservation wars, at the same time advising private, public, and educational projects from Hawaii and Easter Island to Turkey and Morocco. He works on neglected historical subjects and has published many articles, his subjects ranging from the early French buildings along the Middle Mississippi to builder-architect Robert Smith (1722–1777) of Dalkeith, Scotland, and Philadelphia and the invention of the structural I-beam. He edited Building Early America (Radnor, Pa., 1976) and was the editor of the "American Notes" of the Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians from 1950 to 1967.

CAROLYN PITTS is the Senior Architectural Historian of the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record, National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. 20240. She wrote The Cape May Handbook (Philadelphia, 1977) and the descriptions for Sculpture of a City: Philadelphia's Treasures in Bronze and Stone (New York, 1974), for which she also did the archival work. She was Executive Assistant, Division of Education, at the Philadelphia Museum of Art, held a Fulbright Lectureship in Istanbul, Turkey, and taught at St. Joseph's College, Temple University, and Beaver College before joining HABS/HAER.

CAROLE RIFKIND is a free-lance writer and consultant who lives in New York City. Her fields of interest are architecture, urban development, and travel. She is coauthor with Carol Levine of Mansions, Mills, and Main Streets (New York, 1975) and author of Main Street: Face of Urban America (New York, 1975) and A Field Guide to American Architecture (New York, 1980). She has written articles for the New York Times, Travel and Leisure, American Arts, and other publications.

RODRIS ROTH is a Curator at the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of American History. She has written on a variety of topics, including tea drinking in eighteenth-century America, the Colonial Revival, and patented furniture. She has worked on a number of exhibitions at the Smithsonian, including the "Hall of Everyday Life in the American Past," "1876: A Centennial Exhibition," and the special display "Going to Housekeeping."

ALICIA STAMM is Archivist for the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record collections at the National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. 20240. These collections, begun in 1933, document over seventeen thousand sites of national architectural and engineering significance. She formerly worked as a manuscripts assistant in the Archives of American Art, Smithsonian Institution. She contributed to the Archives of American Art Exhibition Card Catalog (Boston, 1978). Her educational background is in art history and museum administration.

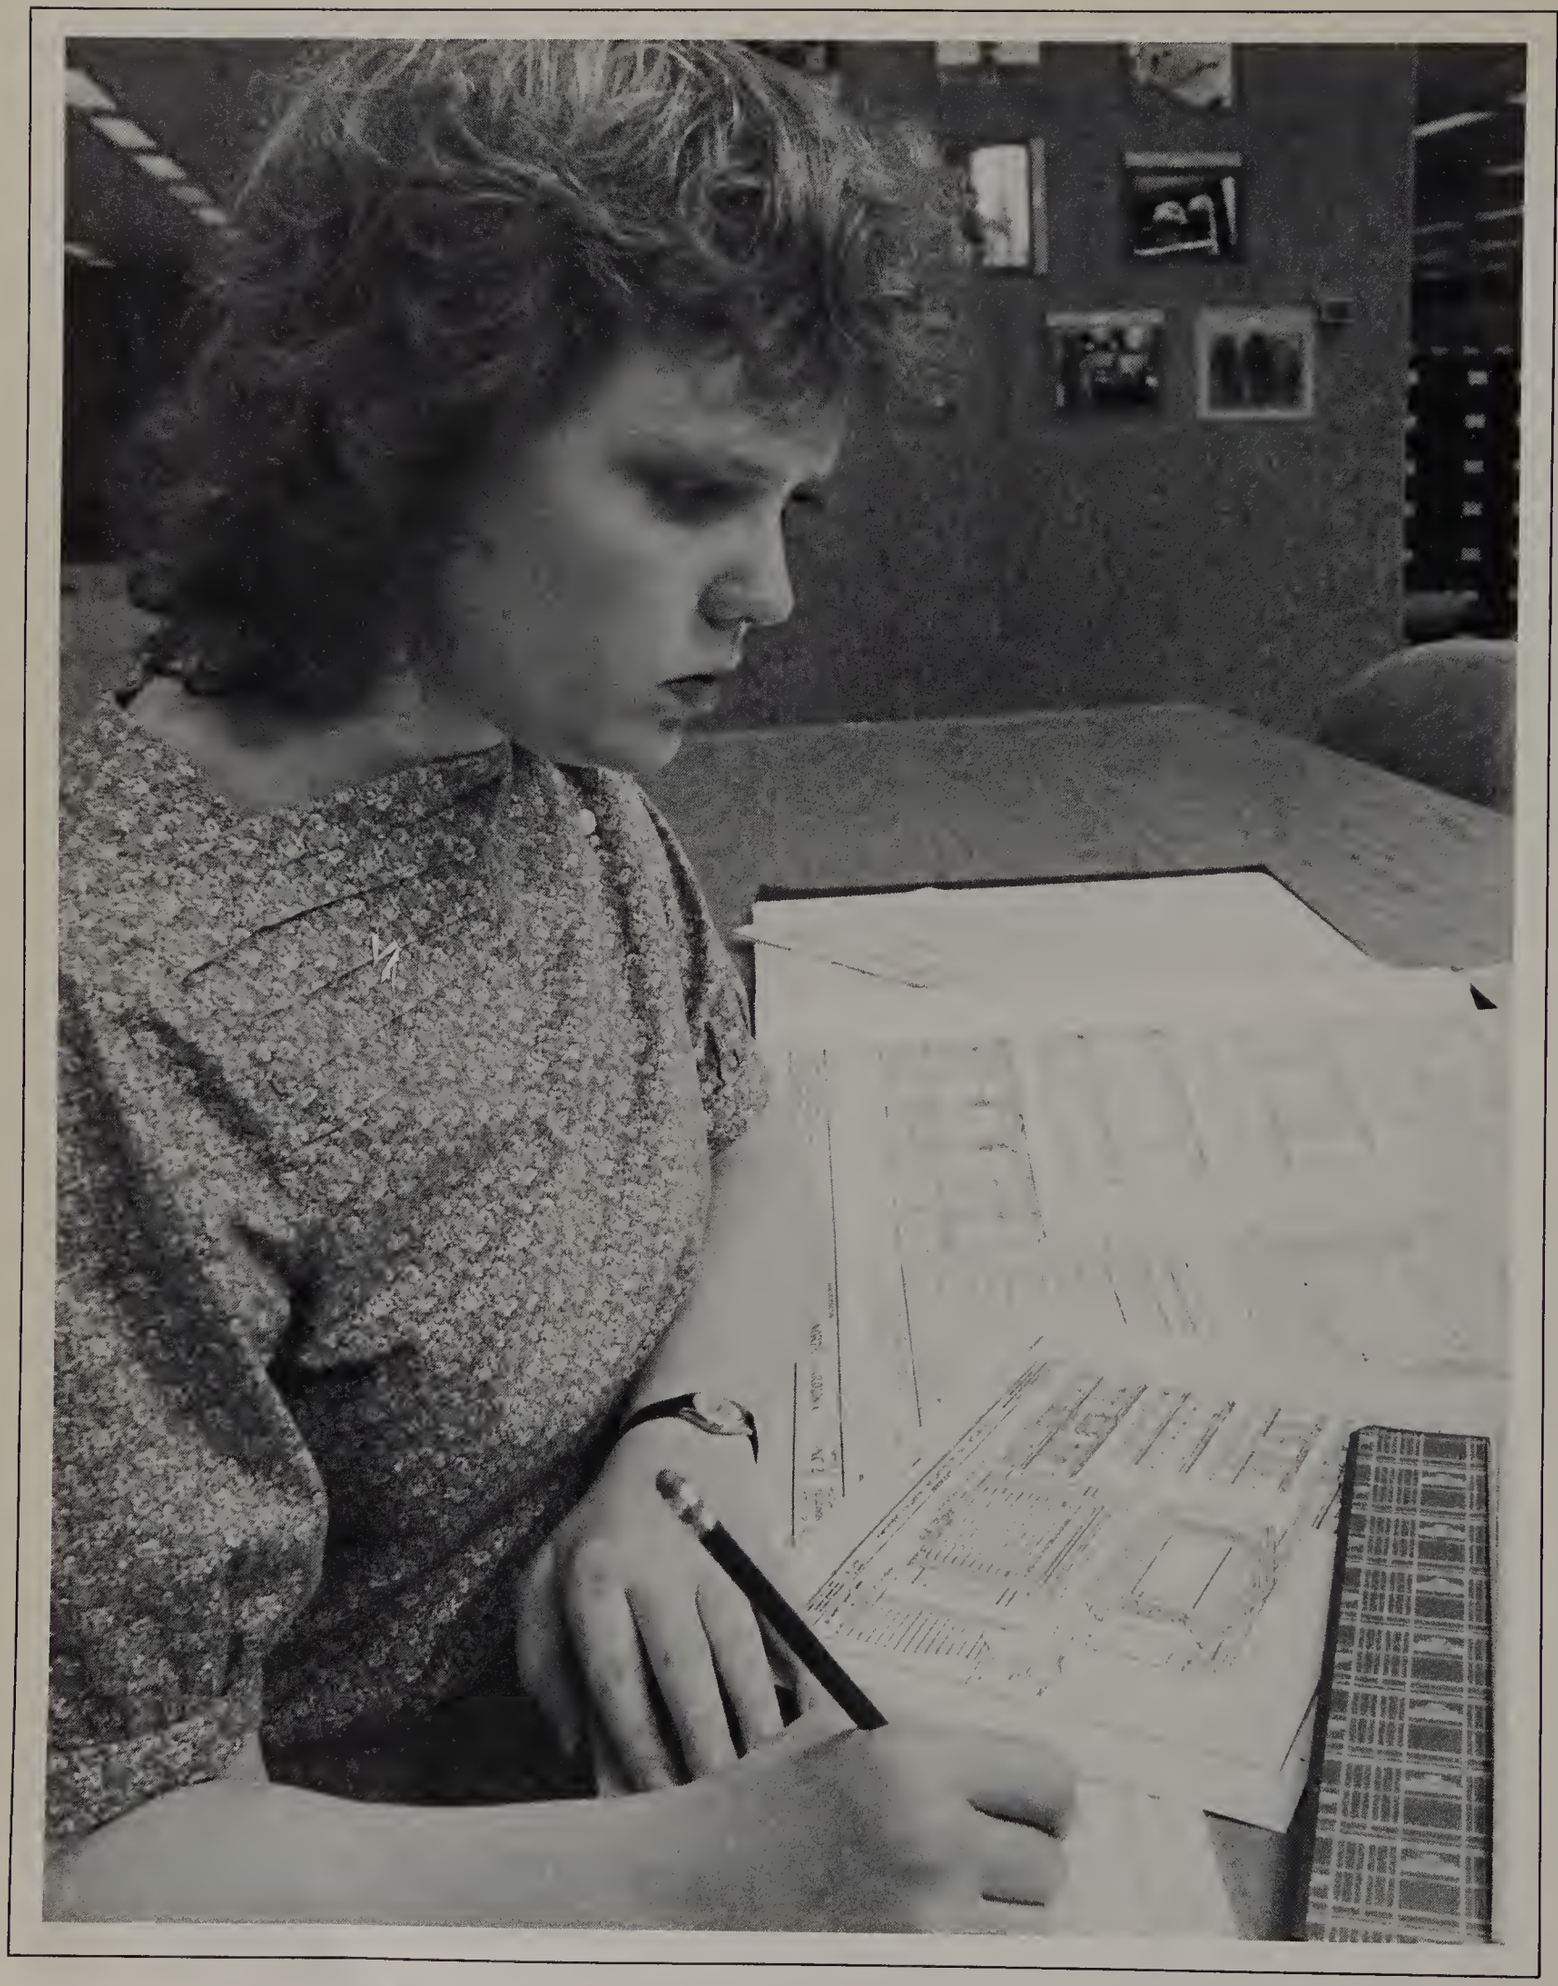

GEORGE TATUM is a resident of Old Lyme, Connecticut, where he devotes his time to teaching an occasional course, writing and lecturing about architectural history and gardens, and tending his own garden. His preparation for these activities included thirty years of teaching, first at the University of Pennsylvania and later at the University of Delaware. More recently, he has been a visiting professor at Williams College and at Columbia University in the Graduate School of Architecture and Planning. At various times during his professional career, Dr. Tatum has served as president of the Society of Architectural Historians, as a member and chairman of the Advisory Board of the Historic American Buildings Survey, and as a member and chairman of the Commission of the National Collection of Fine Arts (now the National Museum of American Art). In 1961 he was elected an honorary member of the American Institute of Architects for his contribution as an architectural historian. His works include Penn's Great Town: 250 Years of Philadelphia Architecture in Prints and Drawings (Philadelphia, 1961) and Philadelphia Georgian: The City House of Samuel Powel and Some of Its Eighteenth-Century Neighbors (Middletown, Conn., 1976).

SAMUEL WILSON, JR., F.A.I.A., is a practicing architect and architectural historian at Koch and Wilson, Architects, New Orleans, Louisiana 70130. He was made a Fellow of the American Institute of Architects in 1955. His firm has done numerous restoration projects in Louisiana and Mississippi and as far away as Corpus Christi, Texas, and Edenton, North Carolina. He has published numerous articles on Louisiana and Gulf Coast architecture and over the past forty years has lectured on Louisiana architecture at the Tulane University School of Architecture, his alma mater, and at other universities and historical associations. He edited Impressions Respecting New Orleans by Benjamin Henry Boneval Latrobe (New York, 1951). He has served on the board and as president of the Friends of the Cabildo, Associates of the Louisiana State Museum, and has contributed articles to their published series, New Orleans Architecture. He has also contributed to Frenchmen and French Ways in the Mississippi Valley (Urbana, Ill., 1969) and The Spanish in the Mississippi Valley, 1762–1804 (Urbana, Ill., 1974), edited by John Francis McDermott.

HISTORIC AMERICA

Buildings, Structures, and Sites

Using the HABS/HAER Collections at the Library of Congress

by

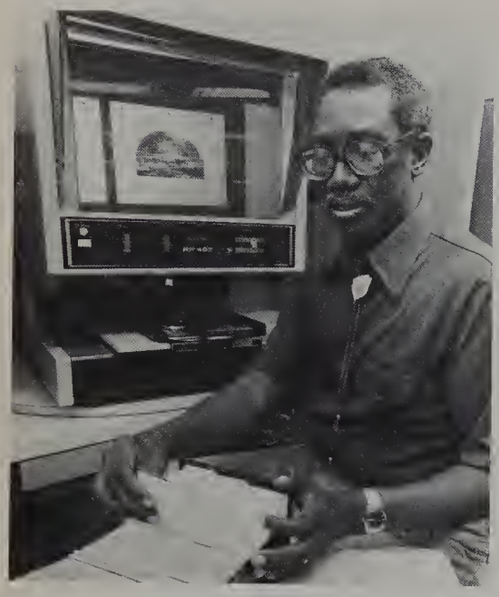

MARY M. ISON

For fifty years the photographs, measured drawings, and written histories of buildings made for the Historic American Buildings Survey have delighted and served readers in the Prints and Photographs Reading Room of the Library of Congress. With its sister collection, the Historic American Engineering Record, established in 1969 to record engineering sites, it is one of the division's most popular collections. The use of these two surveys is equaled only by use of the Library's extensive visual holdings of the Civil War and the now popular depression-era pictures taken by the Farm Security Administration/ Office of War Information.

First among the attractions of the two surveys is that all materials in them are in the public domain. The Library's Photoduplication Service can provide, at reasonable costs and in a variety of kinds of reproduction, copies of all types of documentation in the surveys, and these copies can be used in any way desired. Second, the materials are created in standardized sizes and formats, ensuring a uniformity throughout the collection which allows for convenient and easy use. Third, a variety of card catalogs, indexes, lists, printed catalogs, books, and microfiche and microfilm publications allow for easy use both by persons able to visit the collections and those who by necessity must use them from a distance.

The HABS/HAER collections were conceived by their founders as records to be used by the public in a variety of ways. The agreements which established the surveys are signed by the U.S. Department of the Interior, which administers them, the Library of Congress, which houses and serves the collections created through the surveys to the public, and the advisory groups for each survey—the American Institute of Architects for HABS and the American Society of Civil Engineers for HAER. They state that the records created will be housed at the Library of Congress where proper care, preservation, and reference service can be ensured. The Library's commitment to this charge, as well as the continuing popularity of the surveys, has resulted in reference and cataloging systems unparal-

HABS/HAER documents are filed in easy-to-use formats and sizes. Measured drawings are available in both large, seventeen-by-twenty-four-inch copies and reduced, eight-by-ten-inch photocopies. Black-and-white photographs are mounted on eight-by-ten-inch mounts and filed in ring binders with corresponding captions and written histories. The general arrangement is by geographic area, with additional access by subject and name of architect or engineer. In the Prints and Photographs Division Reading Room all types and sizes of HABS/HAER documents are available for use.

Readers who are unable to visit the collections at the Library of Congress will find that microformat publications of the HABS collections can be extremely helpful in making full use of the Survey. HABS measured drawings were published by the Library of Congress on microfilm in 1974 and the photographs and written histories by Somerset House on microfiche in 1980. Many libraries throughout the country have bought these publications, facilitating use of the Survey nationwide.

leled in other Prints and Photographs Division holdings. Readers with a wide variety of concerns therefore find the collections a great resource not only because of the material they include but because of its availability.

The HABS and HAER reference collections are housed in the Prints and Photographs Reading Room of the Library of Congress. All readers are welcome to visit the collection at that site and examine the records and finding aids in person. The records are arranged by geographic order: state, county name, city or vicinity, and building name or the order in which the building was recorded within the given vicinity. Captioned black-and-white photographs, primarily five-by-seven-inches in size, are mounted on eight-by-ten-inch mounts in ring binders. When a written history is included, it is typed on eight-by-ten-inch paper and filed in the ring binder behind the photographs for the structure. Measured drawings are filed either in a reduced format (eight by ten inches) in the ring binders with the other documentation for a building, or, and this more likely, in a seventeen-by-twenty-four-inch format in separate binders, these also arranged by geographic place. A duplicate set of drawings in an eight-by-ten-inch reduction format is filed by HABS and HAER survey number, a unique number for each building assigned by the U.S. Department of the Interior as a building's documentation is being created.

With the exception noted above, the HABS and HAER survey numbers are not used by the Library as filing numbers. Instead, each building is assigned a unique call number based on its geographic designation. Not all buildings are recorded with all three forms of documentation but all forms can be retrieved by using this one call number. This number also serves as the negative number for individual photographs. A card catalog providing a card for each building or site and giving the amount of documentation and applicable call numbers for the available records also follows the geographic arrangement. This arrangement serves readers well, as it enables records for areas of the country, for several or individual states, for portions of states, or for individual structures to be pulled with ease. In many cases the card catalog need not even be consulted. For example, if a reader wishes to examine log buildings in eastern Pennsylvania, the cards in the card catalog may not specify the building material. The reader might find appropriate sites more readily by determining the counties in eastern Pennsylvania and calling for all the materials in those counties.

The primary access by geographic location is supplemented by a card index to records by subject, vertical files of reduced-size measured drawings arranged by building type and survey number, and a card index by name of architect, engineer, or firm. Thus a reader interested in measured drawings of banks can be given a file of reduced-size drawings in which to browse, and photographs of the buildings shown in the drawings can be found through the geographic card catalog. A reader interested in the work of a particular architect or engineer can check the biographical card index to determine which of his designs are included in the Survey.

Many people are excited by the possibilities offered by the resources of the HABS/HAER surveys and the Library receives a steady stream of readers who make trips to Washington specifically to use these collections. It has always been the intention of those responsible for the surveys, however, that they be accessible to people throughout the entire country. This was made clear by the printing in 1938, only five years after the Historic American Buildings Survey was created, of the first published catalog to the HABS collection at the Library of Congress. A second national catalog followed in 1941 and a supplement to that publication was published in 1959. After 1959 it was decided that the size of the survey prohibited future national catalogs, and a program of publishing building lists by state and region was begun. This publishing program has been adopted also by the Historic American Engineering Record, with the first national catalog to that collection published in 1976, only eight years after the Record was established.

The checklist of buildings in this volume is the first attempt to list all buildings and sites in both surveys and is the first national catalog to the HABS collections since the publication of the 1941 catalog and its 1959 supplement. It is intended to serve as a major guide to persons unable to visit the collections in Washington.

There are, however, several additional aids for long distance use. First, the Library can provide a list of publications about the surveys, including all published catalogs. Second, a list of publications which reproduce substantial portions of the HABS collection is also available. Of great importance on the latter list are two publications in microformat. A microfilm of all HABS measured drawings at the Library of Congress as of 1974 may be ordered from the Photoduplication Service of the Library of Congress. A microfiche edition of all photographs and written histories in the Library's cataloged collections as of January 1979 is available from the publisher, Somerset House, Teaneck, New Jersey. These microform publications are being bought not only by libraries throughout the country but by individuals who purchase them to view on machines at their area libraries. Both of these lists include ordering information for the publications cited.

The reader who must use the collection from a distance can write the Prints and Photographs Division to request an information packet on the Architecture, Design, and Engineering Collections that includes written information on the HABS and HAER collections. Included is the list of HABS and HAER catalogs and other publications, the bibliography of publications which reproduce portions of the Historic American Buildings Survey, a price list for all types of reproductions of documentation in the two collections, a list of subjects for which building lists have been compiled by the Library staff, and basic information on both surveys as well as the general architectural and engineering collections in the Prints and Photographs Division.

Copies of all HABS and HAER materials which have been transferred to the Library are available through the Library's Photoduplication Service. Current price information is available from that service as well as from the Prints and Photographs Division. Readers making requests for copies should provide names and locations of the buildings in which they are interested and specify the type of documentation desired. The Library will cite the amount of documentation available and provide an order form with building identification numbers and a price quotation. This order form is returned by the reader with the proper payment to the Photoduplication Service, the office which actually makes the copies and sends them to the reader. Limited photocopying facilities are available in the Prints and Photographs Reading Room.

Preservationists, historians, students, genealogists, authors, architects, engineers, and others interested in buildings and history are welcome to use the great resources of the HABS/HAER collections. Through printed catalogs to the surveys, the publication of the collections in both print and microform, and the provision of excellent reference facilities where the collections are physically housed, the Library of Congress and the U.S. Department of the Interior have attempted to make the wealth of these surveys available to the American public for which they were created. We invite you to use this material and to share the delights and rewards it offers.

Copies of all HABS/HAER materials at the Library of Congress can be obtained through the Library's Photoduplication Service. Lists of prices, price quotations for specific documents, and other information for ordering copies of materials in the collections can be obtained from the Library by mail or in person. Readers able to visit the Library can call upon the experienced reference staff to advise on duplication options and prices.

The Historic American Buildings Survey: Its Beginnings

by

CHARLES E. PETERSON

The Historic American Buildings Survey did not begin in a bureaucratic routine. It was founded a half century ago by a handful of public servants in a burst of idealism and energy. Distinction was achieved through the immediate and generous help of outside friends who agreed that it would be fine to build a treasury of American architectural information. Under the conditions that prevail today, it probably could not have been started.

Looking back over a half century, one sees that the years have taken their toll and the people who created the Survey have mostly gone to their reward. Their written records have been hustled off to oblivion by efficiency experts. A large and forgetful bureaucracy has grown up and HABS has been able to survive only by good luck as it staggers from one Interior Department reorganization to another. If it had not made so many friends in the early days, the Survey would probably have expired long ago—like the other New Deal programs of the 1930s.

As a survivor of those days, I am often called upon to describe the beginnings of HABS and to recall some of the people who built quality, character, and interest into the vast collection of records so splendidly housed today in the new Madison Building of the Library of Congress. And so popular with Americans who care about our historic architecture.[1] My recollections of places and persons are vivid but somewhat colored by a variety of prejudices. I hope the reader will forgive the personal character of these notes.

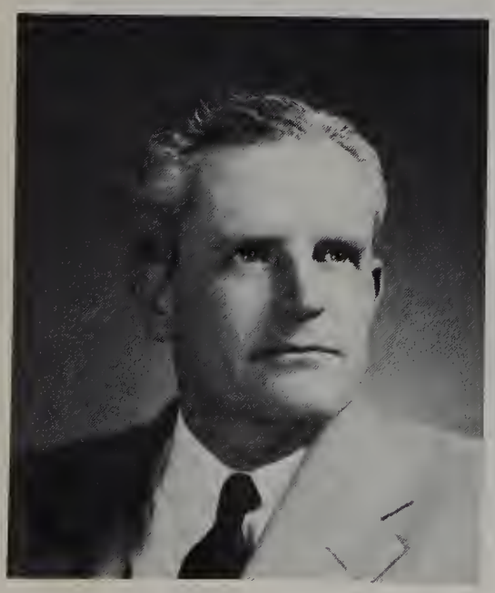

My own background was out-of-doors in the West, like that of most of the pioneers in the National Park Service. Work for pay in the field of history began for me on a field trip in January of 1930 to the eighteenth-century Mission San Cayetano del Tumacacori in the desert near Nogales, Arizona. All of us professionals in the Service were at that time headquartered in San Francisco. But in September of that year I was to unpack my bags in the "Vest House" on Duke of Gloucester Street in Williamsburg and—except for World War II—I have been continuously involved ever since with elderly structures and their problems. I found myself in an unnamed but distinctive profession

Figure 1 Branch of Plans and Design drafting room in the Navy Building on Constitution Avenue, Washington, about 1934. HABS sprang from this office as a program by architects for architects. Here was designed the seventh floor of the old Interior Building on Rawlins Square to which HABS was later moved. T.T. Waterman is seated at the drafting board in the foreground.

Figure 2 Arthur E. Demaray, native of Minnesota, came as a draftsman from the U.S. Geological Survey and eventually served as director of the U.S. National Park Service. that has been called "the geriatrics of the building business."

After three unforgettable years in Virginia I was ordered to remove to Washington. Then, on a Sunday afternoon in November of 1933—in an apartment at 2501 Calvert Street (now demolished)—I wrote a proposal for what very soon became the Historic American Buildings Survey. The pencilled sheets have been preserved as a souvenir of those exciting times.[2] The following day I discussed the draft with Arthur E. Demaray, associate director of the Park Service (fig. 2). Quick and imaginative, he thought it could fly as a relief project for architects unemployed in the Great Depression. President Roosevelt was then shaking the national capital with ambitious new programs, and nothing seemed too bold to try.

Within two weeks a tidy sum of nearly half a million dollars was set aside by the Civil Works Administration, then inhabiting the Walker-Johnson building on New York Avenue (now demolished).[3] HABS had picked up the support of Secretary of the Interior Harold I. Ickes and of Harry Hopkins and Louis Howe, close advisers to the president. Very little overhead or equipment was required and work could start in record time. It did.[4]

For a national program, the money and personnel had first to be set out in quotas by states. Some midnight work in the drafting room—architect Alston G. Gutterson (Al was recently from Montana) assisting on the slide rule—turned the trick. The first and principal staff members were quickly recruited. Architect and historian Thomas T. Waterman (Tom was lately of the Williamsburg Restoration but at the time unemployed and studying in England), John P. O'Neill (formerly of Notre Dame University and recently returned from an archaeological dig in Latin America) and Dudley C. Bayliss (teaching at Fargo, North Dakota) were ready for action. Frederick D. Nichols (of Colorado and about to be graduating from Yale) joined them. All were architects (figs. 3, 4, 5).

Then new in the East, the Park Service was pretty much unknown in the field of historic conservation. Professional support needed to be rounded up. Leicester B. Holland, architectural scholar of Philadelphia and Washington, was at that time wearing two convenient hats (fig. 7). At the Library of Congress he was head of the Division of Fine Arts. He also was a Fellow of the American Institute of Architects (AIA) and chairman of its national historic buildings committee. There was a vice chairman of the AIA committee too—Edward W. Donn of Washington—but no other members I can recall. Holland joined us with ready enthusiasm and he helped design the format of the HABS records so as to make them both convenient to file and yet readily available to users in his reading room and to those ordering copies by mail.

Edward C. Kemper, executive secretary of the AIA, an exceptionally adroit and cooperative administrator, saw the possibilities and quickly obtained the unanimous approval of his national board. He telegraphed the local Institute chapters across the country, which brought forth the best talent in the profession. Special pains were taken to recognize those who had already achieved success and recognition in the historic field. Richard Koch of New Orleans, Charles Morse Stotz, Jr., of Pittsburgh, and Frank Chouteau Brown of Boston stood out from the start.

In accordance with the initial proposal, a national advisory board was promptly assembled. My own nominations were architects Leicester B. Holland, William G. Perry of Boston, Albert Simons of Charleston, and John Gaw Meem of Santa Fe as well as historian Herbert E. Bolton, the great Spanish colonial scholar of the University of California at Berkeley. Arthur Demaray nominated Harlean James of the American Civic and Planning Association and Waldo G. Leland of the American Council of Learned Societies to give the program a good Washington front. They became lifelong supporters. Secretary Ickes added Thomas E. Tallmadge, Chicago architect-author, and I. T. Frary of Cleveland, an architectural historian. It was a blue ribbon group.

In those same months, the Park Service (its name had been unexpectedly but temporarily changed to the Office of Parks, Buildings, and Reservations) was then being loaded with new responsibilities all over the East. Its chief of design and construction, Thomas C. Vint, was directed to move his headquarters from San Francisco to Washington. He complied with orders— though reluctantly—and took over personally the direction of all the bureau's planning, landscape, and architectural operations. They included HABS, and for the next twenty-seven years Tom Vint was the Survey's ardent in-house champion (fig. 10).

The tiny headquarters staff of HABS had to work in a continuous frenzy in order to cope with fast-changing rules and the almost continual reorganization of the New Deal emergency programs. But within a few weeks HABS found it possible to put up a fine exhibition of measured drawings and photographs at the National Museum in Washington. The quality was excellent and the press favorable. All across the country occupants of old buildings were surprised to learn that their homes and offices were of interest to the Library of Congress.

The Washington Evening Star selected for its report on April 5, 1934, four photographs which showed the variety of building art being investigated. There was a sun-dried pueblo church, a Richard Koch shot of a French landmark in New Orleans, a Dutch windmill near what is now the O'Hare airport in Chicago, and a collapsing tavern near the mouth of the Wabash River (fig. 6). That diversity reflected the broad concept of the program, which called for a general canvass of structures erected between the earliest times and 1860. There was in those days a general consensus that Victorian buildings were ugly and not worth serious study or any effort to save them. Indeed, Greek Revival was only then coming up for attention and the two first works on that subject, I remember, were avant-garde curiosities. Now, a half century later, the pendulum of taste has swung the other way. To many enthusiasts, anything with a few feet of jigsaw on one end is antique and therefore venerated as a national monument.

It seems worth remembering that HABS was a program designed by architects for architects. Several years were yet to pass before the founding, by a splinter group from the College Art Association, of a block of dissidents which first called itself the American Society of Architectural Historians. And it was some sixteen years before David Finley of the National Gallery in Washington rallied the conservation group subsequently called the National Trust for Historic Preservation. Today we live in an age of expensive interdisciplinary teams undreamed of fifty years ago.

In the 1930s the historical wing of the architectural profession was mainly concerned with investigating Georgian buildings that could serve as good models for new buildings. Beginning a half century earlier with a renewal of interest in what was called Early American design, prospective homeowners as far away as Kansas City and San Francisco had got the urge to live in red brick Georgian houses. Their architects were glad to accommodate and in the East they began to make measured drawings of old floor plans, facades, and interior details. These appeared in periodicals and books and even penetrated the offices of giants like McKim, Mead and White, who obliged millionaires with large wooden Colonial houses in fashionable resorts. This taste spread generally and eventually, in 1926, engulfed John D. Rockefeller, Jr., in the restoration of Colonial Williamsburg.

That spectular project was at first

Figure 4 John P. O'Neill, from a passport photograph taken in Merida, Mexico, while he was on a Carnegie dig in 1933. He was one of the first appointees to HABS and served to 1937 as manager during the hectic early days of the unemployment relief program.

Figure 5 Frederick D. Nichols, native of Trinidad, Colorado, was recruited for HABS as he was graduated in architecture from Yale in 1934. Nichols stayed with the program until the U.S. Navy claimed him for World War II. He became Langhorne Professor of Architecture at the University of Virginia and writer of architectural history, especially of Thomas Jefferson's buildings.

Figure 6 Washington Evening Star, April 5, 1934. HABS has been a popular subject for the American press, which has by invitation exploited both photographs and drawings. The Washington Star for November 29, 1933, carried the first HABS picture story, and one of the latest may be found in the magazine Historic Preservation for January-February 1983, titled "Racing against Oblivion," by Andy Leon Harney. The Survey has always encouraged authors to use its records and in some instances priority has been given to subjects relating to proposed publications. Survey activities and materials have also been used to attract support for buildings threatened by urban renewal and other forces.

the province of the architects Perry, Shaw and Hepburn. The Boston firm, setting up shop in Virginia, naturally stirred memories of the Civil War disasters of the nineteenth-century, and some locals grumbled that their town was being "Yankeefied." But the architects, of whom William Graves Perry was certainly the genius, took their opportunity seriously. They began the graphic analysis of the distinctive Tidewater eighteenth-century style with the brilliant success still to be seen in their earliest work. It ranged all the way from wooden smokehouses in backyards to the great reconstructed Governor's Palace.

Careful study of the numerous antique structures still standing across the Tidewater country gave the architects a mastery of the local style. The relationship between structures and measurements projected on paper became a highly developed subject. The drafting rooms were full of adventure and excitement and every junior architect was working on a book of his own. Though not a Rockefeller employee, I was working nearby (Jamestown to Figure 7 Leicester B. Holland of Philadelphia was a key man from the beginning as he established HABS as a permanent feature of the Library of Congress. Yorktown) and knew them all. Williamsburg society, both professional and civilian, floated on an evening tide of corn whiskey and there were few secrets. Those were great years; a fine time to be alive and learning.

Compiling documents of early architecture for publication, as we have seen, had already been under way for decades. In England a large collection had been made under the guidance of the Royal Institute of British Architects[5] and in New York the Architects' Emergency Committee had produced drawings to illustrate two fine volumes called Great Georgian Houses of America (1933, 1937). HABS was bigger and wider in scope. But its great innovation was ready availability at moderate cost.

While HABS was producing records of other peoples' buildings, the Park Service was taking over care of a wide variety of structures belonging to the nation. These buildings needed repairs and restoration, and it was made the policy to translate in-house measured drawings into HABS format so they could be preserved at the Library of Congress. If such drawings stay with the architects they get lost sooner or later. The Moore House, a small frame revolutionary war landmark at Yorktown, Virginia, became a part of the Colonial National Monument. Its restoration had begun in 1931. The Figure 8 The preparation of measured scale drawings depicting existing conditions is usually the first step undertaken in planning any restoration. The Moore House on the York River below Yorktown, Virginia, was a feature at the town's Sesquicentennial Celebration in 1931. This sheet was redrawn four years later by Walter G. Peter, Jr., of Washington, D.C., for a report published in 1981. It shows (left) the nineteenth-century wing removed during restoration. In 1926 he became head of general planning for the landscape and architectural program of the Western Field Headquarters in San Francisco. Figure 11 The Old Custom House (now known as the Second Bank of the United States) in Philadelphia became redundant and was taken over by the Park Service in the late 1930s to save it. Measured drawings were made in preparation for a restoration funded by the Carl Schurz Foundation. William Strickland originally won the job in an architectural competition; the handsome, marble structure was built 1819–24. It is now a museum in the Independence National Historical Park. architects' plans were afterward specially redrawn on HABS sheets for my 1935 report titled The Physical History of the Moore House, 1931–34. That publication (not in print until 1981) set a precedent that was later followed, though not consistently (figs. 8, 9).

HABS had originally been started under the authority of the National Industrial Recovery Act. When that was overturned in the courts, the Survey was specifically legitimized by the Historic Sites and Buildings Act of 1935. In the meantime the relationship of the Park Service to the American Institute of Architects and the Library of Congress had been reaffirmed by the Tripartite Agreement of 1934. Five years later it was agreed that the Survey was worth continuing and four field offices (Boston, Washington, St. Louis, and San Francisco) were set up substantially with well organized architectural teams and a station wagon each. I took over direction of the Mississippi Valley office, which encompassed the region from Iowa to Louisiana and Kentucky to Kansas.

The spectacular achievement of HABS was marked by the publication of a national catalog in 1938. In letterpress, abundantly illustrated by drawings and photographs, it announced to the American community the availability of the collections. A second and much enlarged edition appeared three years later, the fateful year that ended in Pearl Harbor.[6]

When the Independence Park project began at Philadelphia in 1950, the great postwar building boom was going on, and experienced draftsmen were unavailable. At that juncture, it was found possible to employ students during their summer recess, following the successful example of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. We could soon demonstrate that carefully selected students under carefully selected supervisors could be trained to examine old structures intelligently and to produce excellent drawings of them. Once that was established our new student summer programs under the "Mission 66" program spread to such places as the Adams Mansion at Quincy and the village of Harpers Ferry, West Virginia, where a major restoration program was planned (fig. 13).

Russell of Baltimore have now been restored by the Park Service. The basic drawings were prepared by summer teams of architectural students. Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–19351)

As an inducement to serious students we promised to coach them in drafting, have outside lecturers on local history, and generally make the subject worthwhile and interesting. This appealed to the school faculties and we got cooperation in recruiting. Among the first schools to offer promising students were the University of Illinois, the Rhode Island School of Design, and the University of Florida.

It should be clear by now that the potentialities of HABS are vast, indeed. Even the excavated substructures of demolished historic buildings can be studied and recorded profitably. Unfortunately, archaeology in this country has now become the almost exclusive domain of anthropologists, most of whom don't understand buildings. The contributions of HABS architects at seventeenth-century Jamestown, Virginia, have been almost forgotten, as have the spectacular revelations at Mannsfield near Fredericksburg on the Rappahannock. Those records were intended to be emulated but have been generally overlooked (figs. 14-17).

On the other hand, HABS successfully pioneered historical photogrammetry in this century by contracting with Prof. Perry E. Borchers of Ohio State University (OSU) for sheets of "measured" drawings. I am still proud of his first product, done in Figure 14 The first Park Service archaeologists at seventeenth-century Jamestown were Indian mound diggers from the Middle West. A battle of professional prerogatives was soon raging and the echoes have hardly died down even yet. Henry Chandlee Forman of Maryland served as captain of the architectural teams which recorded the substructures excavated, along with a selection of architectural specimens. Here we have a casement window frame of wrought iron probably fabricated in England. It seems to be a unique survival in this country. Measured drawing by Henry Chandlee Forman, 1935. 1957—the Plum Street Temple in Cincinnati (fig. 27). It was soon followed by OSU recording in Philadelphia, New York City, and other places.

Our success with a few examples of engineering and industrial structures led to the establishment of the Historic American Engineering Record (HAER), which brings to the fore a whole new set of history buffs. With the leadership of such enthusiasts as Robert Vogel of the Smithsonian and other less visible supporters, HAER, we hope, will have a splendid future. The historical relics of American leadership in technology are even more fragile than its architecture. "Industrial archaeology" as a public interest did not arrive a minute too soon.

Not everything new was good. Among the disastrous programs of a recent administration was an attempt to add social engineering to the summer student program. It was the kind of expensive failure that should not be repeated.

Alternative means of building up the collections were explored. In some areas, student measured drawings done in HABS format were purchased or donated, and extensive work was done at North Carolina State University and the University of Florida. One of the more unusual cooperative projects was our American field party working in the Virgin Islands with the Royal Academy of Arts of Copenhagen in 1961. The making of measured drawings had been a regular part of architectural education in Denmark. Annually the academy dispatched parties of students to interesting places—in this case to the Caribbean, where Danish colonists of the eighteenth and nineteenth century left a rich collection of colorful architecture (fig. 21).

Special funding under the Park Service's "Mission 66" program made it possible to take a very wide view of the United States, and an attempt was again made to program work in areas previously bypassed. For some time there had been loose talk in some circles about "completing HABS." One of our first steps was to obtain a blank county map of the country, in which there are some three thousand counties.[7] We then selected Chester County, Pennsylvania, for an example (fig. 22). The historical society there had an impressive dossier on each of its favorite historical structures and together we picked out 100 of them to be photographed and written up on standard data sheets. This was done and the accomplishment was celebrated by a dinner party at West Chester at which a large set of salon prints were displayed, opening up a public showing.

The historical writeup was by Curator Bart Anderson.In cooperation with the Chester County Historical Society, 100 buildings in that county were selected for photography. (HABS PA–5136–4, LC HABS PA, 15–THORN, 1–4)

Afterward it was pointed out that if this were done for all the American counties, we would have a new collection of three hundred thousand structures represented by 1.5 million photographs. Talk about "completing HABS" soon died down and the Survey was afterward referred to as an "open-end archive."

As outside requests for recording increased, it was possible to get local assistance in kind to make our funds go farther. An early example was Dartmouth College, which offered us a headquarters for our Middle Connecticut Valley season.

During the establishment of the Cape Cod Seashore National Park, HABS became a great help in public relations. Some of the local residents worried that the Smoky Joes would tear down all the historic landmarks in an attempt to return the area to a pris-

Figure 23 Liberty Hall, Frankfort, Kentucky. This fine house constructed by Virginia bricklayers in the closing years of the eighteenth century went through many changes, especially in the original rear wing shown here. In the twentieth century private owners began to restore the house by removing later intrusions one at a time, making the evolution of the various parts hard to follow. During recent work by the Kentucky Colonial Dames, HABS drawings by L. H. Tehman dated 1934 were important to understanding the structure. (HABS KY–20–2, sheet 7 of 15 sheets)

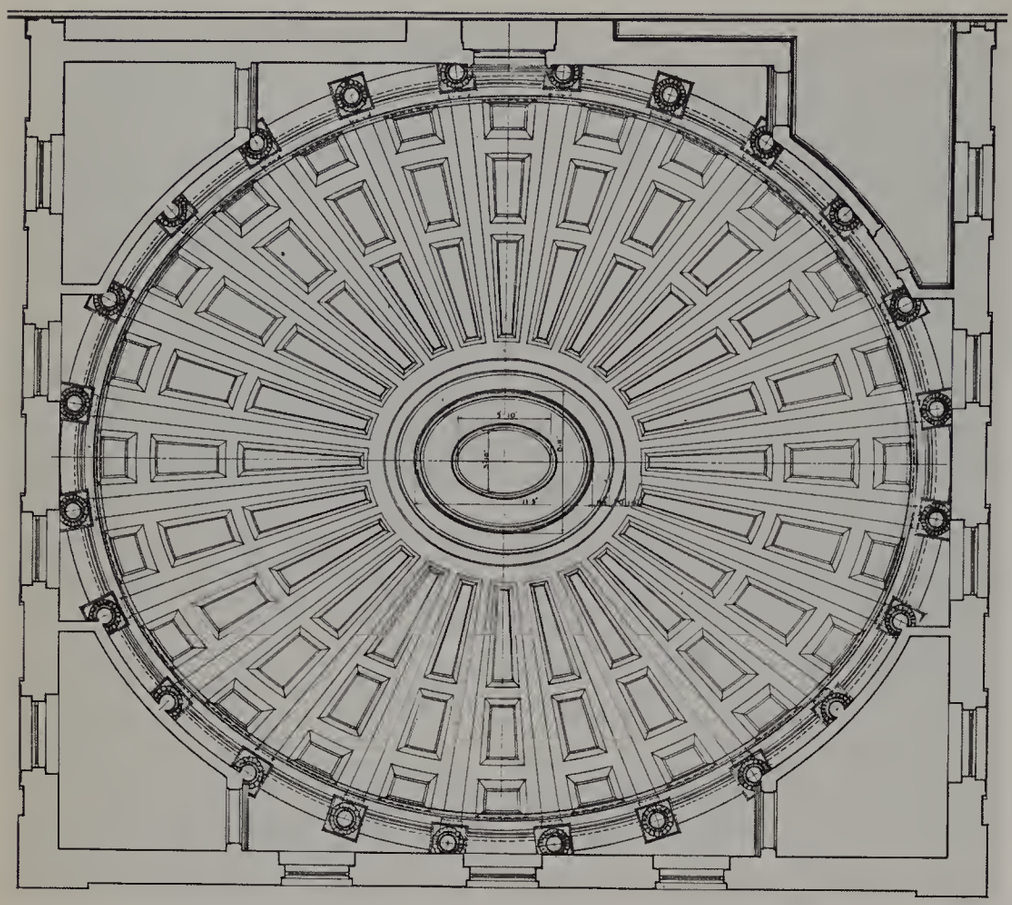

Figure 24 Old St. Louis Courthouse. This great stone structure, built over a twenty-five year period, was the climax of the Greek Revival style west of the Mississippi. It became part of the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial on the Mississippi riverfront and one of the few buildings to escape demolition. In preparation for restoration, a large set of measured drawings was made by Park Service architects. The wooden ceiling of this second floor courtroom was hung from a pioneer example of wrought iron triangular truss. Drawing by staffer Frank R. Leslie, 1940. (HABS MO–31–8, sheet 46 of 49 sheets)

Now called the Castillo San Marcos, this picturesque structure was built of the local coquina rock and exhibits the classic features of bastions (with guerites or watchhouses), moat, and drawbridge. It guards the entrance to the harbor of this picturesque Spanish town dating from the sixteenth century. Drawing by J. Erwin Page, 1936. (HABS FLA–17, sheet 1 of 9 sheets)

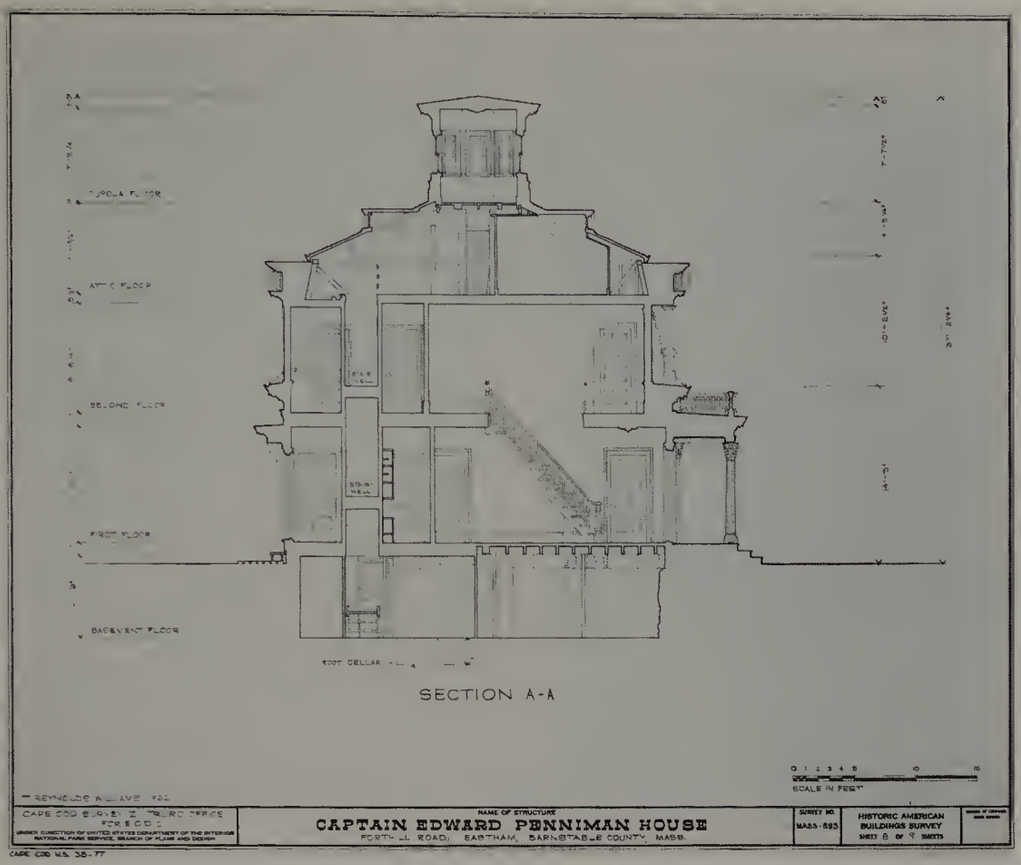

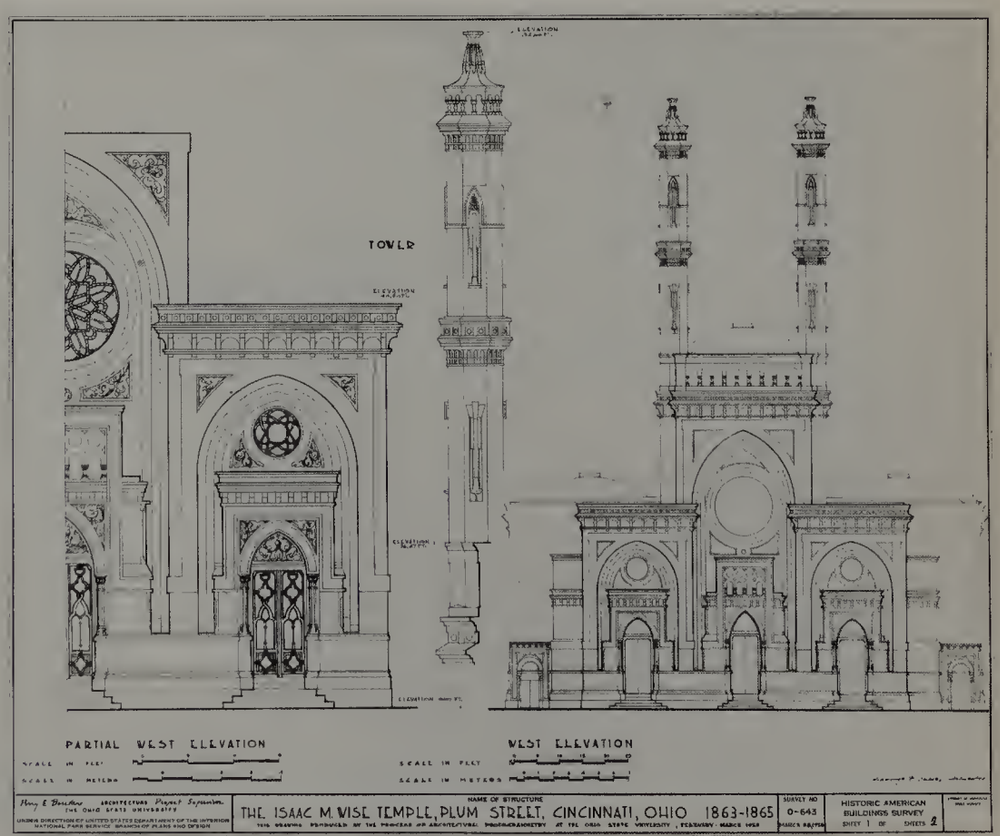

Figure 26 Captain Edward Penniman House, Fort Hill Road, Eastham, Barnstable County, Massachusetts. The work of HABS summer teams on Cape Cod from 1959 through the 1960s led the National Park Service to establish policies for the classification, protection, and documentation of historic buildings in national recreation areas. HABS recorded structures like this Victorian sea captain's house and examples of the widely imitated "Cape Cod cottage." Sectional elevation by Reynolds Williams, 1962. Figure 27 The Plum Street (or Isaac M. Wise) Temple, Cincinnati, Ohio. Much of the elaborate ornament on this oriental fantasy would have been impracticable to record by conventional methods. But Professor of Architecture Perry E. Borchers, pioneer architectural photogrammetrist at Ohio State University, developed successful procedures by which draftsmen delineated architecture on plotting machines from photographic glass plates made under carefully controlled field conditions. Drawing by George F. Erssey, 1957. (HABS O–643, sheet 1 of 2 sheets)

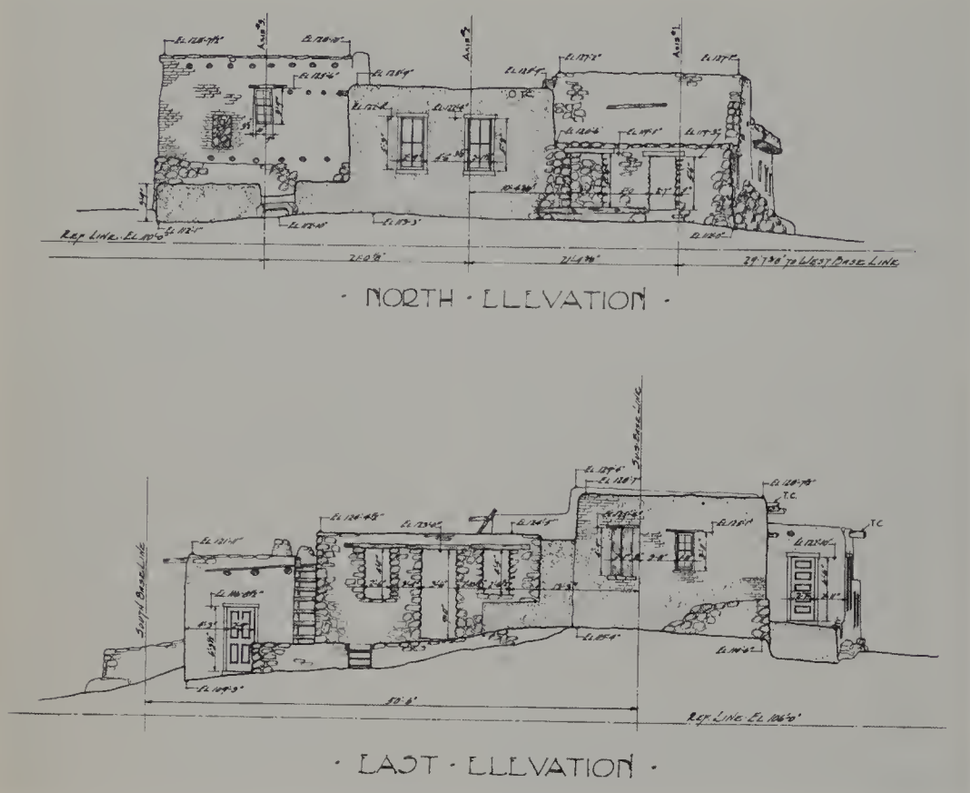

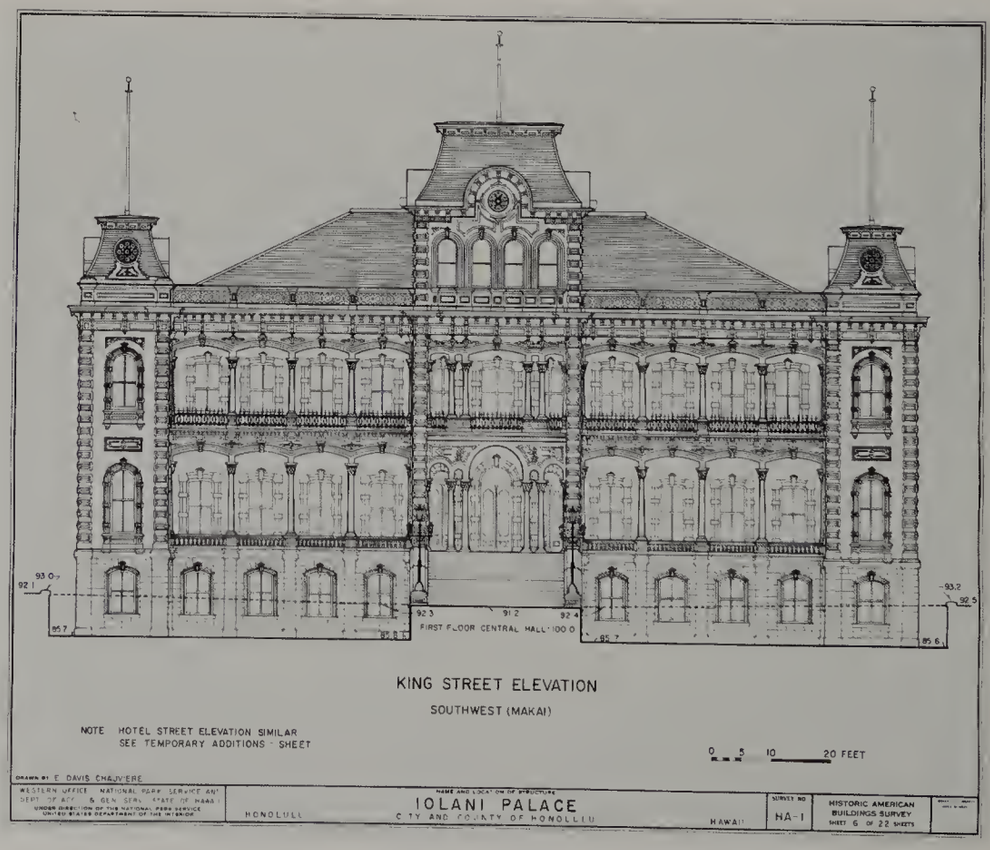

Figure 28 Acoma Pueblo, New Mexico. In 1934 a team of architects went south from Denver to the Indian country to record structures where there were no local architects. Clusters of primitive houses like these are difficult to record because there are few if any right angles that can be easily handled on a standard drawing board. More recently, some of the pueblos have been covered by photogrammetry done from the air, making more accurate drawings possible. Measured drawing by Paul Atwood, Stanley Kent, and A. G. Longfellow, 1934. (HABS NM–6, sheet 59 of 85 sheets)

Figure 29 Iolani Palace, Honolulu, Hawaii. This great brick structure was built for Kalakaua, last of the Hawaiian kings, in 1879–81. The all-around iron porches (called lanais) were cast in San Francisco and the whole finished with a dazzling coat of sanded paint. There were three architects: T. J. Baker, C. J. Wall, and Isaac Moore. (See Charles E. Peterson, "The Iolani Palaces and the Barracks," Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians 22: 96–102.) Drawing by E. Davis Chauviere of the Columbia University School of Architecture team, 1966. (HABS HA–1, sheet 6 of 22 sheets) tine wilderness. Two seasons of HABS teamwork under Ernest A. Connally of the University of Illinois helped relieve the tensions on the Cape (fig. 26).

I am also proud of two summers' work under a contract with Columbia University, where I taught from 1964 to 1978. No HABS records at all had been made in distant Hawaii, an area with which I had some familiarity. Working with state and local experts, teams under Profs. Melvin M. Rotsch of Texas A & M and Woodrow W. Wilkins of the University of Miami made a fine set of records (fig. 29). Good photographic coverage of the Honolulu landmarks—as well as a scattering of those in the outer islands—was added by photographer Jack E. Boucher.

When the Park Service historical architects were all under one roof, the HABS summer programs were deliberately contrived to enlist new talent for careers in the Service. Every effort was made to locate bright students not yet brainwashed by the stern idealogues of the International Style. By encouraging the best of the summer talent to throw in with the Park Service's conservation program, we gradually assembled a notable group. Since that effort was dropped, nearly a whole generation of such students has been missing or remains as yet unidentified.

I am sometimes asked about the future of HABS, and I must say it now looks rather dim. The Survey's advisory board was surreptitiously dropped five years ago. Within the Park Service the architectural profession has been fragmented, dispersed, and suppressed. Management—whatever that is—rides the wave. Attempts to "reprofessionalize" the Service seem to get nowhere. Overhead, the weight of the highly political Interior Department is felt as suffocating. In its preoccupation with the raw resources of the West, the department, under recent administrations, leaves the impression that the national parks as an ideal are only for juveniles and that the historic treasures of the nation are for the crazies. A general jailbreak may be the only solution.

But if its natural friends outside the federal government are encouraged to participate—as they were in the beginning—there will be no end to the usefulness and growth of the Historic American Buildings Survey.

The Survey in Louisiana in the 1930s

by

SAMUEL WILSON, Jr.

The financial crash of 1929 and the Great Depression that followed brought building activity in Louisiana, as in the rest of the nation, practically to a standstill. Huey P. Long had been elected governor of the state in 1928 and soon had the architectural firm of Weiss, Dreyfous and Seiferth designing a new state capitol (fig. 2). Numerous other state buildings were being planned and built as well. Nevertheless, there was little or no work for many established architects, for recent graduates of Tulane University's School of Architecture, or for many draftsmen.

Following the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt as president in 1932 and his inauguration on March 4, 1933, his program for economic recovery began to be implemented. Among the many projects initiated to relieve unemployment were several in the cultural and artistic spheres and one to give jobs to "starving architects," the Historic American Buildings Survey, developed largely through the efforts of Charles E. Peterson of the National Park Service. As the HABS program was planned as a three-party agreement among the National Park Service, the Library of Congress, and the American Institute of Architects, the local chapter of the Institute was asked to set up the program in Louisiana to document historic buildings in that state.

Moise H. Goldstein, F.A.I.A., who served for many years as Gulf States regional director on the national board of the Institute, presented the proposal to the chapter and nominated Richard Koch as district officer in Louisiana (fig. 3). Koch accepted the position with enthusiasm, not only because of the slowness of work in his firm, Armstrong and Koch, but largely because of his interest in the historic architecture of his native state and his appreciation of it. He had been graduated from Tulane University in 1910 and after two years of study in Paris and several years in New York and New England offices, had begun his own practice in New Orleans in partnership with Charles R. Armstrong in 1916.

Armstrong and Koch were pioneers in restoration and adaptive reuse of buildings of historic and architectural importance in Louisiana. They restored Shadows-on-the-Teche (fig. 4) in New Iberia for Weeks Hall in 1922 and Oak Alley Plantation at Vacherie in 1926 for Mr. and Mrs.

Andrew Stewart. They restored the Victor David House on St. Peter Street for Le Petit Salon, a ladies club, also in 1926 and built a new building adjacent to it, in a traditional style, for Le Petit Théâtre du Vieux Carré that same year. No better choice than Richard Koch could have been made to organize and direct the Historic American Buildings Survey in Louisiana.

There had been earlier recording efforts made in Louisiana and practically from its beginnings in 1907 the Tulane University School of Architecture encouraged the study and recording of Louisiana's historic architecture. In the 1913–1914 Year Book of the Department of Architecture, some of a set of measured drawings of the "Old Hurst Residence" made by four students were reproduced, drawings which are now deposited in the Southeastern Architectural Archive in the Tulane University Library. In 1922 this house, built in 1832, was taken down and reerected on a suburban site by Armstrong and Koch, architects, who made use of these early measured drawings. Tulane students continued to produce measured drawings of old buildings and architectural details, as well as historical studies, for which the S. S. Labouisse Prize is awarded annually. Unfortunately, only a few of these drawings have been preserved at Tulane. One such drawing was published in the Western Architect in March 1928—a wrought iron gate at 613 Royal Street by A. A. Callender. It was titled "Tulane Series No. 4," but neither this nor any other drawings of such a series have been found at Tulane (fig. 5). These early documentation efforts, however, provided the training which enabled the Survey in Louisiana to produce such high quality results.

Work for the Survey began in January 1934 in offices at 614 Audubon Building, on the same floor as the offices of Armstrong and Koch. From the office of Moise H. Goldstein came F. Monroe Labouisse and this writer, Tulane graduates in 1932 and 1931 respectively. Among those from other local offices in which there was little or no work was Douglass V. Freret, a 1925 Tulane graduate with a master's degree from Cornell in 1926, who came from the office of Favrot and Livaudais. From the office of Weiss, Dreyfous and Seiferth, where they had completed the drawings for the new Louisiana State Capitol in Baton Rouge (fig. 2), were G. E. Dupont, H. H. Dowling, Horace Trepagnier, and W. Byron Proctor. Others in this first few months of the Survey were David C. E. Geier, Allison Owen, Jr., Robert G. Crump, Ulisse M. Nolan, and Myrthé Stauffer, all Tulane graduates, Louis Sarrazin, Jr., apprentice and office boy in the Armstrong and Koch office, and Walter McKinstry, who had worked similarly in the Goldstein office. Others included F. P. Dufrechou, Charles J. Phillips, and O. Couloheras. All were excellent draftsmen and in the first year produced an extraordinary number of beautiful measured drawings that set a standard that was followed in the years to come. Helen Niver was employed as secretary, doing the necessary typing and keeping the records of the day-to-day activity. Richard Koch kept a close watch over all the work in the office and insisted on the highest standards of quality in all the drawings.

Koch selected the buildings to be measured and drawn, basing his choice on the importance of the building, architecturally and historically, its availability, its danger of destruction, and his own personal interest and preference. Measuring began first on the Beauregard House at 1113 Chartres Street in New Orleans, with a field party under the direction of Douglass V. Freret consisting of Allison Owen, Jr., Gaston E. Dupont, this writer, Myrthé Stauffer, Horace Trepagnier, and F. Monroe Labouisse (fig. 6). By the end of June 1934, sixteen sheets of drawings had been produced by Freret, Foster, Geier, Owen, and Proctor.

This important raised house with a four-column portico was built in 1826, and, for a brief period after the Civil War, Confederate General P. G. T. Beauregard lived in it. In 1925 the house was sold and slated to be demolished and replaced by a warehouse. A group of patriotic and historically minded citizens succeeded in purchasing it but were unable to finance its restoration. In the 1940s it was leased to Frances Parkinson Keyes, the novelist, who began the work of restoration under Richard Koch's direction and making use of the HABS drawings of the 1930s. In 1955 she acquired the house from Beauregard House, Inc., for the Keyes Foundation, which

The present status of this drawing is unknown.

Figure 7 Main stairway, old Ursuline Convent, New Orleans. The only building surviving substantially intact from the period of French domination in Louisiana, this convent, also known as the Archbishopric, was recorded by HABS in 1934. It was designed in 1745 by Ignace François Broutin. This stairway was reused from an earlier convent (1727–34) near the site, according to a manuscript toisé of the building dated 1749, now in the Library of Congress. Original plans of both convent buildings are in the Archives nationales, Paris. Photograph by Richard Koch, 1934. (HABS LA–18–2, LC HABS LA, 36–NEWOR, 2–16) still owns and operates it as a historic house museum. Frances Keyes wrote several of her well-known novels here, including two which used the house as the setting. In 1954 she purchased the adjacent corner property and restored the garden that had formerly existed there. This restoration was based on a drawing of 1865 found in the Notarial Archives by HABS researchers in the 1930s. Mrs. Keyes died at Beauregard House on July 3, 1970. The HABS drawings, photographs, and historical data concerning the house were published as one of a series in the Architectural Forum in November 1935.

The second project undertaken in Louisiana was documenting the old Ursuline Convent at 1114 Chartres Street, opposite Beauregard House. Thirty-one sheets of drawings were produced to document this National Historic Landmark, the only building known to survive almost intact from Louisiana's French colonial period. At the time the building was generally known as the Archbishopric, and this became the name of the HABS project. The field party consisted of this writer and Gaston E. Dupont, who also made all but one of the drawings. I had made measured drawings and done some research on the building as a student project at Tulane in 1929 and I did most of the research for this HABS project. It had been believed for well over a century that this was the building that had been built by Royal French Engineers between 1727 and 1734 to house the Ursuline nuns who came to New Orleans in 1727 and had occupied this site until the early 1820s. My interest in architectural history was stimulated by HABS, and I received an Edward W. Langley Scholarship from the American Institute of Architects in 1938 to do research and study on the origins of Louisiana architecture in Europe. In Paris in the Archives nationales, I found drawings and other documentation clearly proving that the former Archbishopric was actually the second convent erected on the site for the Ursuline nuns. It was designed by Ignace François Broutin in 1745 and completed in the early 1750s. Research in the Library of Congress revealed that the great staircase of the earlier convent was reused in the later building. It is still in place in the building, which has recently been renovated to house the archives of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of New Orleans (fig. 7).

Koch appreciated the importance of careful documentation of buildings that were to be included in the Survey and expanded the staff to include several researchers. They worked in parish conveyance offices to trace chains of titles and in the New Orleans Notarial Archives, where they found countless building contracts and examined early and mid-nineteenth-century watercolor drawings of building plans, elevations, and perspectives in more than a hundred plan books on file in that office (fig. 11). Many of these were meticulously copied by the artist Boyd Cruise (figs. 8, 21), who also made many of the HABS sheets of hardware, cast ironwork, plaster ornaments, and other decorative details. Cruise also made many watercolor sketches in the field to record the color and character of buildings included in the Survey (fig. 1). Additional research was done in New Orleans in the newspaper files and other resources of the New Orleans Public Library, the library of the Louisiana State Museum (fig. 13), the City Archives, then located in the attic of the old City Hall on Lafayette Square, the Howard Memorial Library at Lee Circle, the Tilton Library of Tulane University (fig. 9), and many courthouses throughout the state.

Photography had become one of Koch's hobbies, and he personally took practically all the photographs included in the HABS collection. He used an old camera that produced four-by-five-inch negatives, and he often spent Saturdays and Sundays on photographic expeditions in the city and in the country. He had made a trip around the state in 1927 with the noted architectural photographer Robert W. Tebbs, from whom he gained much knowledge of photography. Most of Koch's photographs were developed and printed by the local photographer Dan S. Leyrer, who also made a number of enlargements that were used in a HABS exhibition at the old Arts and Crafts Club.

Koch was particularly interested in the plantations of Louisiana, an interest probably stemming from his earlier work on the Shadows and Oak Alley. I accompanied him on extensive tours of the state in 1934 and 1935 to inventory and photograph many of these buildings for the Survey. On some of these trips we were joined by A. Hays Town, district officer for HABS in Mississippi, an old friend who had once worked in the Armstrong and Koch office. With Hays, we also visited many Mississippi plantations and country houses.

In the first year of the Survey, the dovecote or pigeonnier and dollhouse (fig. 16) at Angelina Plantation were measured and drawn. Not long afterward, these interesting little plantation outbuildings were demolished. In that same year, 1934, the Réné Beauregard House at Chalmette (figs. 15, 17), on the site of the 1815 Battle of New Orleans, was recorded on nine HABS sheets by Charles J. Phillips. The house was later badly damaged by vandals and by neglect so that when it was eventually acquired by the National Park Service and restored as a visitors' center for the Chalmette National Historical Park, the HABS drawings were an invaluable aid in its restoration.

Woodlawn Plantation (fig. 18) near Napoleonville was selected as a project, and a field party consisting of F. P. Dufrechou, R. G. Foster, David Geier, W. B. Proctor, and this writer spent many a cold winter day in December 1934 measuring every detail of that abandoned derelict, then stored with hay and later demolished. We could not find accommodations any closer than Donaldsonville, where we obtained rooms in the town's old-fashioned hotel. Twenty sheets of drawings of this important plantation house resulted from this expedition (fig. 19).

Some projects were undertaken on an emergency basis as a building

This building, which now houses the archives of the Historic New Orleans Collection, was restored on the basis of this drawing in 1978, Koch and Wilson architects. was threatened with immediate demolition. Such was the case with the Central Congregational Church (fig. 20). A contract for the demolition of this handsome Greek Revival church with a tall spire had already been let when permission to record it was obtained from the demolisher. In March 1935 a field party consisting of F. P. Dufrechou, Louis Sarrazin, Jr., Charles Phillips, David Geier, and this writer began the task. We only just finished as the building was falling down around us and the demolisher ordered us to leave. Six sheets of drawings and four of Koch's photographs record this interesting building.

Another such last minute project was the Troxler cottage at 919 St. Philip Street in New Orleans. This was a small eighteenth-century house in ruinous condition and practically unknown. It was not until the last year of the Survey, in the summer of 1940, that it was learned that it was to be demolished. Georgia B. Drennan and Chester H. Wicker led a field party that also included C. R. Coleman, H. S. Kenison, U. J. Theriot, and Boyd Cruise. The building was promptly measured and drawn up on four sheets of drawings, perhaps the last project completed by this New Orleans team (fig. 21).

The Louisiana State Bank, the last design of Benjamin Henry Latrobe and now a National Historic Landmark, was among the important buildings measured in the first weeks of the Survey and drawn during the first year (fig. 24). The field party consisted of Peter F. Donnes, Jr., H. H. Dowling, Charles Phillips, Jr., and Walter McKinstry. Eighteen sheets of drawings were produced by Dowling and Phillips and by Douglass V. Freret. Drawings from field notes were often made by others who were not actually on the field party. Later visits, however, were often made to a building to verify details and moulding profiles. Koch checked these personally and insisted on the greatest possible accuracy.

Research and writing for the Louisiana State Bank project were done mostly by this writer. As a result, I became so interested in Latrobe that I later became acquainted with the Latrobe family in Baltimore, edited and published Latrobe's New Orleans Journals in 1951, and, that same year, married Ellen Elizabeth Latrobe in Latrobe's Baltimore Cathedral. In December 1936 the HABS drawings and historical data of the Louisiana State Bank were published in the short-lived Southern Architectural Review.

During the course of the first two years of the project, which came under the Works Progress Administration in Louisiana, many of the original teams returned to private employment and some transferred to other WPA projects. One of these was for the development of the New Orleans City Park, a project in which Koch himself was particularly interested. A drafting room was set up in the Casino Building in the park under the supervision of David Geier. I worked with Koch in the Audubon Building offices and in association with the firm of Weiss, Dreyfous and Seiferth in designing the City Park Stadium, various park buildings, gardens, pools, bridges, roads, and so forth. We used HABS drawings in the design and detailing of many of these park buildings and indeed of Koch's own house. I remained in Koch's office, eventually becoming a partner, continuing with him until his death on September 20, 1971.

About 1936, after the dissolution of the Armstrong and Koch partnership, Koch removed his office from the Audubon Building to the Queen and Crescent Building. Offices for the Survey were then obtained in the Stern Building at 348 Baronne Street, and the work continued under Koch's direction and the office supervision of Robert G. Foster, then Chester H. Wicker, and finally Georgia Bertha Drennan. After a few years in the Stern Building, Koch secured offices for the Survey in the second floor of the old Arts and Crafts Club, then located at 712 Royal

Nearby Madewood Plantation, built by the same architect in 1846 for Thomas Pugh, brother of the builder of Woodlawn, was not recorded in measured drawings but only in photographs, as it was not in danger of destruction. Madewood has been carefully restored by its present owners, Mr. and Mrs. Harold K. Marshall. (HABS LA–20, sheet 5 of 20 sheets)

Street, through the generosity of the owner of the building, Sarah Henderson. Though no longer officially part of the HABS staff, I remained interested in the work of the Survey and participated in research in the courthouse archives and accompanied Koch on photographic expeditions. The Louisiana project continued through 1940 when the approach of World War II brought an end to the Works Progress Administration.

As the work of the HABS office in New Orleans was drawing to an end in 1940, a team was sent to Louisiana from the HABS central unit at the St. Louis National Park's office to record a number of significant buildings that had not yet been documented. This unit, with F. Ray Leimkuehler as architect-in-charge, consisted of A. H. Felder, J. P. Marlow, and W. Van Valkenburgh. During 1940 this team recorded Homeplace Plantation at Hahnville, Louisiana (figs. 23, 22), Uncle Sam Plantation at Convent (fig. 25), demolished soon after, Chrétien Point Plantation (figs. 26, 27), and the Lastraps house (fig. 28) near Opelousas, Louisiana, later destroyed by fire. Many of Koch's photographs of these buildings taken during the 1930s are included in the Survey records in the Library of Congress. The work of the St. Louis Central Unit was done under a Public Works Administration program.

In 1965 a student team under James C. Massey, HABS director in Washington, and led by Woodrow W. Wilkins measured and drew the Lanoix House at 514–518 Toulouse Street in New Orleans and added other drawings from records in the office of Richard Koch and myself. When that office undertook the restoration of Shadows-on-the-Teche in New Iberia for the National Trust for Historic Preservation in 1961, the building was drawn up on HABS sheets for inclusion in the Survey.

When the HABS Louisiana office closed about 1940, the research files, index cards, and other records were deposited in the library of the Louisiana State Museum in New Orleans. Most of this material consisted of chains of title to properties in the Vieux Carré and other areas, filed by square and municipal district number. This material had been compiled by HABS researchers from records in the Parish Conveyance Office and the Notarial Archives. Koch felt that this title information was essential to determining the true history of a building.

In 1961 the Vieux Carré Survey was started as a project of the Louisiana Landmarks Society and sponsored by the Tulane University School of Architecture, financed by grants from the Edward Schleider Foundation. The Vieux Carré Survey was intended to document every property in the historic district in New Orleans with prints, photographs, and written data. The HABS records proved to be an invaluable aid in this documentation, and they were transferred from the Museum library to the Vieux Carré Survey office, which was established in the historic Merieult House at 533 Royal Street through the generosity of Gen. and Mrs. L. Kemper Williams. The Vieux Carré Survey records have since been deposited in the Historic New Orleans Collection of the Kemper and Leila Williams Foundation, where the material is available to researchers. The Collection staff continues to add material and provides reference service. The Vieux Carré Survey might be considered as an outgrowth of the Historic American Buildings Survey. Boyd Cruise, who had been part of the HABS program through the years, served as director of the Vieux Carré Survey. Richard Koch and I served on the advisory committee of this important project (fig. 3).

Drawings, photographs, and research data of the Historic American Buildings Survey have been used frequently in restoration projects. Among these were the restoration of the Cabildo, the Arsenal, and the Jackson and Creole Houses of the Louisiana State Museum, in New Orleans; Live Oak Plantation at Bains, Louisiana; and the Courthouse at Clinton (fig. 30). HABS has preserved the images of great buildings since lost, like Afton Villa (fig. 29) at St. Francisville, and continues to record important structures, even as they are demolished (fig. 31). The New Orleans Sugar Exchange, built 1883–84 by architect James Freret, would not even have been considered for recording in the 1930s, yet by 1963 its architectural significance could be recognized. Through its past and ongoing recording of the state's architectural legacy, HABS in Louisiana can be considered to be one of the most significant projects of lasting benefit of the Works Progress Administration.

Documenting a City: Philadelphia

by

GEORGE B. TATUM

Philadelphia was the subject for one of the first major Historic American Buildings Survey monographs devoted to a single city. Philadelphia Preserved[1] appeared in 1976, and the principal considerations that lay behind its publication are not far to seek.

During the eighteenth century, colonial prominence (fig. 2) and a central location on the Atlantic seaboard had made Philadelphia a logical site for many of the events leading up to the American Revolution and to the subsequent establishment of the new republic. And if later economic leadership—and with it architectural preeminence—seemed to pass to New York and Chicago, Philadelphia remained a railroad and mercantile center of importance (fig. 3), the site of the Centennial Exhibition (fig. 4), and, late in the nineteenth century, the home of a group of architects who produced collegiate and domestic designs of remarkable sensitivity and distinction (fig. 5).

Though Quaker Philadelphia has traditionally treated its architectural heritage with indifference, almost from the beginning there were those who sought to produce a visual record of the ever-changing city. Names like Birch, Childs, Breton, and Kennedy are well known to print collectors and historians. And even before the end of the nineteenth century a few talented draftsmen undertook to make detailed drawings of some of Philadelphia's most impressive structures (fig. 6). But any kind of detailed architectural record had to await the Great Depression, which freed architects and draftsmen to take part in what came to be known as the Old Philadelphia Survey. Others have told in greater detail how the hundreds of drawings thus produced in Philadelphia and several other American cities were later incorporated into the Historic American Buildings Survey that took shape during the 1930s. Here need only be noted the extent and quality of these early drawings (fig. 7), which, on balance, set a standard of excellence that has seldom been equaled—and almost never surpassed—by later contributors to the program.

Figure 1 Guard box. Built ca. 1873; restored 1973; moved to present site in front of Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1973. As is true of most mid-Victorian structures, this one incorporates elements of several styles, but its pointed openings are unmistakably Gothic, considered at the time to be the most "rural" of past modes and presumably therefore selected as appropriate to the original site in Fairmount Park. Figure 2 East Prospect of the City of Philadelphia. Adapted by Thomas Jeffreys in 1756 from the larger version drawn originally by George Heap and published in London two years earlier. One of the most ambitious of colonial prints, the East Prospect was undertaken at the instigation of Thomas Penn, proprietor of Pennsylvania, and intended to compete with William Burgis's views of Boston and New York. To enliven the Philadelphia skyline, Heap exaggerated the principal spires of the city; in descending order of height there are: Christ Church, the Second (Arch Street) Presbyterian Church (demolished), the State House, and the German Reformed Church (demolished). Engraving by Thomas Jeffreys, London, 1756. Popular and Applied Graphic Arts Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–3282)

Following the Second World War, continuing efforts to preserve the older portions of the city and the subsequent location there of the Eastern Office of Design and Construction of the National Park Service focused renewed attention on Philadelphia. This, in turn, helped bring into being the Philadelphia Historical Commission, one of the earliest and most successful agencies of its kind, and one that both augmented the efforts of HABS and helped provide funds to support its activities. Predictably, the financial support from private and public groups that has always figured importantly in deciding where HABS teams would work and what they would record had also a bearing on the development of the Philadelphia survey—a fact worth remembering when occasionally the detailed attention given an individual structure or a site like Fort Mifflin (figs. 8, 9) seems to threaten the balance of the whole. And if the city's history and its distinguished architecture did not provide sufficient reason to record Philadelphia's architectural past, throughout the 1960s and early 1970s there was always the approaching bicentennial of American independence to be reckoned with.

Like the cities of which they are a part, most buildings are of interest to different people for a variety of reasons. When they used the word historic, early preservationists usually meant a building associated with some person or event important for the history of the region. Not claims of architectural merit for the structure itself but the belief (later found to be erroneous) that it was somehow associated with the Penn family explains the preservation of the Letitia Street (or Court) House, which was moved in 1883 to its present site in Philadelphia's Fairmount Park and which is now valued as the earliest urban structure to survive from the first decades of the city.

And precisely because Philadelphia was among the first American cities to be recorded, the early photographs of the Letitia Street House, like those made Enlarged 1892–94 from designs of Furness, Evans & Co. Demolished 1952–53. Joseph M. Wilson was a civil engineer for the Pennsylvania Railroad who had achieved prominence as one of the designers of two of the principal, but temporary, buildings of the Centennial Exhibition of 1876, and Frank Furness is now recognized as one of the most talented and original American architects active during the last quarter of the nineteenth century. When built, the Broad Street Station was the world's largest passenger terminal, and its more than three hundred feet made the roof of the train shed the greatest permanent span yet achieved. The extensive additions begun in 1892 included terra-cotta decorations designed by the Austrian-born sculptor Karl Bitter. Photograph by William H. Rau, 1894. Courtesy of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The portion of the University Museum pictured here represents less than a third of the gigantic complex originally planned. Such eclectic references as the Japanese gateway, the Moorish courtyard with its reflecting pool, and the distinctive Lombard masonry and characteristic entrance are so skillfully and imaginatively blended that their designers are considered by many to constitute a distinctive Philadelphia School. Figure 6 Woodford, Fairmount Park, front elevation. As first built about 1756, Woodford seems to have been a one-story country house. To this David Franks, crown agent for Philadelphia and a noted Tory, added a second story complete with central pavilion and Venetian (Palladian) window, both prominent features of the mid-Georgian style in the colonies, in about 1772. Franks may also have had something to do with the bold enframement of the front door and the beautifully carved overmantel in the parlor, though these features have traditionally been assigned to the time of Woodford's first owner, Judge William Coleman. Accurate drawings provide the best way to study the Rococo decoration characteristic of the highest quality interiors and furnishings produced in Philadelphia during the middle years of the eighteenth century. Although English books like those of Abraham Swan or Batty Langley may have served to inspire them, most Philadelphia craftsmen knew their trade so well they had no need to follow closely another's design. Figure 9 Fort Mifflin, "with the Operations for reducing it," as drawn by Maj. John André, November 15, 1777. Mud Island, the site of Fort Mifflin, lies off the west bank of the Delaware River, 0.76 miles below the confluence of the Schuylkill and Delaware rivers. Though of limited architectural significance in their own right, the fortifications on Mud Island threatened the British supply lines, and so they were probably represented in more eighteenth-century views and maps than any other Philadelphia subject. After a week-long siege, the British forced the evacuation of the island on the night of November 15, 1777. for HABS elsewhere during the 1930s, are apt to be comparatively poor by modern standards. Too late to be of much value as historical documents, they lack the accuracy and quality we have come to expect in professional work of more recent date. Fortunately, the American Revolution Bicentennial helped spur efforts to correct this deficiency, and many of the later photographs of Jack Boucher, Cortlandt Hubbard, and others are outstanding both as architectural records and as works of art in their own right. Some, in fact, like those of the Arch Street Presbyterian Church (fig. 10), reveal aspects of Philadelphia architecture often neglected or overlooked, even by those who know the city well. Unfortunately for those who would examine them, many of the best of these more recent photographs remain in the files of the Park Service, awaiting transmittal to the Library of Congress and incorporation there in the permanent files of the Survey.

In the wake of World War II, the declining emphasis on draftsmanship in architectural education and the improvements in photography, which led increasingly to the substitution of the photograph for the measured drawing throughout HABS, were also evident in the recording of Philadelphia. But here, too, may be found abundant evidence that the photograph can never entirely supplant the drawing. More than any other feature, it is the plan of the Woodlands that illustrates the extent to which Philadelphia led in the introduction of the new approach to architecture popularized in England by the brothers Adam (fig. 11). In its accomplished use of curvilinear forms the Woodlands went far beyond anything produced in Boston or Charleston at so early a date. And surely no more eloquent testimony could be found of the continuing English bias held in America in general and by Philadelphia and the Hamilton family in particular.

Those who first recorded Philadelphia's architectural past were at no pains to hide their predilection for the eighteenth century, a point of view that during the 1950s contributed to the demolition of numerous nineteenth-century structures in the name of "redevelopment" or simply of "good taste." Not all in the Park Service shared this attitude toward the more recent past, and even if they could not halt the destruction of such a forerunner of the American skyscraper as the Jayne Building (fig. 24), they could record its structural system as revealed during demolition (fig. 12). As time passes, photographs of this kind should prove of increasing value, as should the drawings of interior details of other lost structures, features not likely to have been recorded except by HABS (fig. 13).

Figure 10 West Arch Street Presbyterian Church. Built 1853–55 from designs of Joseph C. Hoxie. Though eclipsed in size by the nearby Roman Catholic Cathedral of Saints Peter and Paul (1846–64) and much less familiar to the general public than either the Academy of Music (1855–57) or the Athenaeum (1845–47), Hoxie's design compares favorably with those Philadelphia landmarks or indeed with most other examples of the renewed interest in the forms of the Italian Renaissance that characterizes many of the most ambitious American buildings erected between about 1845 and the Civil War. Photograph by Cortlandt V. D. Hubbard, 1976. (HABS PA–1696, LC HABS PA, 51–PHILA, 280–5)

By helping to call attention to the merits of nineteenth-century designers, HABS doubtless played a part in the preservation of such controversial structures as John McArthur's City Hall, which as late as 1956 no less perceptive a critic than Louis Mumford dismissed as "an architectural nightmare" but which is now proudly accepted as the premier symbol of Philadelphia as well as the major example of the Second Empire style anywhere (fig. 14). And much the same might be said of the work of Frank Furness, a Philadelphian who designed little outside of his native city. Despite the protests of architectural historians, both inside the Park Service and outside it, such notable buildings by Furness as the Broad Street Station and the Guarantee and Provident banks have been swept away at the urging of antiquarians and those advocating "urban renewal." But lacking funds to build a replacement, the Pennsylvania Academy was obliged to keep its building (fig. 15). Now happily restored to something approaching its original grandeur, the Academy

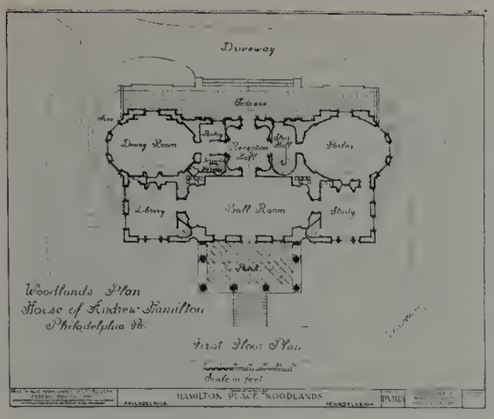

Figure 11 The Woodlands, West Philadelphia. Built (or extensively remodeled) ca. 1788 for William Hamilton, whose admiration for things English came close to supporting a charge of treason at the time of the Revolution. Because many of the elements of the Woodlands appear too close to those in designs of Robert Adam to be entirely coincidental, it seems likely that Hamilton obtained the plans for his new house while in England. Colossal porticoes had been used on English country houses since the 1720s, but that on the south front of the Woodlands, overlooking the Schuylkill River, was the first domestic example of this important feature in Philadelphia. Although rooms for special purposes became increasingly common in American houses following the Revolution, the designations that appear on this plan of the Woodlands owe more to modern practice than to that current when the house was built. Figure 12 Rear view of the Jayne Building, January 2, 1958. Begun 1849 from designs of William Johnston; completed under direction of Thomas U. Walter. Demolished 1957–58. Details of construction, revealed in the course of demolition, confirmed that the Jayne Building had little in common with the skeleton form of the modern skyscraper. On the exterior, conventional brick walls were all load bearing, while within, iron was used only for the columns that supported wooden joists at regular intervals. Photograph by George A. is today widely hailed as one of the most successful American structures to survive from the Victorian period as well as one of the most satisfying of Furness's designs.

If in retrospect it seems that the worth of a building like that of the Pennsylvania Academy should have been recognized more promptly, the same cannot so readily be said of the designs of such contemporaries of Furness as Willis Hale, Angus Wade, or Thomas Lonsdale. Fortunately, HABS has often made it a practice in Philadelphia, as elsewhere, to record structures that are currently out of favor, especially those faced with imminent demolition (fig. 16). Certainly the designs of men like Lonsdale loomed large in the cityscape of their day; perhaps later generations will discover in

Since it stood until 1939, when it was demolished to make way for a parking lot, there are numerous photographs of the exterior of the Washington Square Presbyterian Church. Not so well known is the extent to which Greek motifs inspired the interior details shown in this and other of the drawings made in 1931. Trained for the profession in England and the author of the first book published in America to include the Greek orders, Haviland helped establish Philadelphia as a leader in the emerging interest in Greek architectural forms notable among architects of American buildings erected during the second quarter of the nineteenth century. Figure 14 Philadelphia City Hall. Begun 1872 from designs of John McArthur, Jr., who had been awarded first place in the competition of 1869. After 1874 McArthur had an experienced consultant in the person of Thomas U. Walter, whose influence should perhaps be seen in the upper stages of the tower. These are of cast iron, a material used to advantage for the dome of the U.S. Capitol, for which Walter had earlier provided the design and supervised the construction. Even before it was topped out in 1894 the tower of City Hall had been surpassed in height by the Washington Monument and the Eiffel Tower, but for a decade it remained the tallest occupied structure in the United States and may still be said to be the highest building supported entirely by load-bearing walls without the aid of a steel frame. them virtues more recent ones have largely overlooked.

However that may be, to the first recorders of Philadelphia buildings it must have seemed that a city— like an individual—is entitled to be remembered by its most noteworthy achievements. They made no apologies for concentrating their attention on the major structures to survive from the eighteenth century. In this, they chose wisely. Christ Church, Mount Pleasant, or the Powel House still command our attention, both for their intrinsic beauty and for the clues to life in colonial Philadelphia they provide. Nor can historians safely disregard structures of this caliber that no longer stand. In the case of Chalkley Hall (fig. 17), for example, the colossal pilasters that define the corners are usually considered a distinguishing feature of Middle Georgian architecture in New England and one which is otherwise all but unknown in the central colonies at the same period.

Just as early in the twentieth century collectors and museum directors sought colonial interiors to serve as background for the furnishings being assembled in numerous museums around the country, the first delinea-

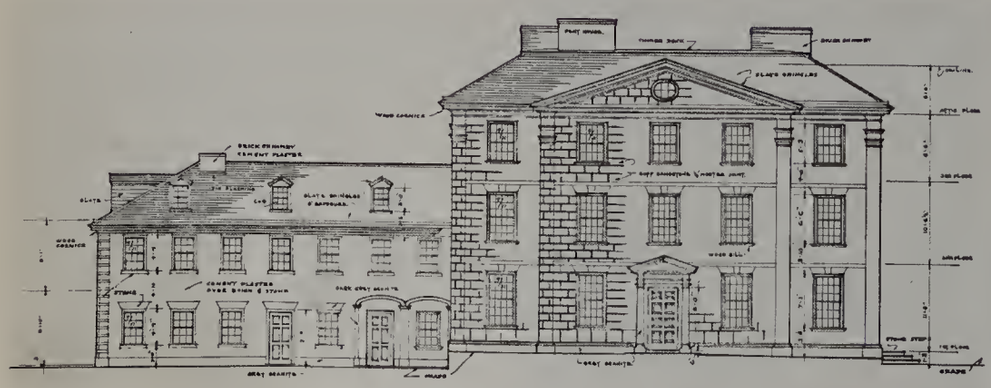

Figure 17 Chalkley Hall, North Philadelphia. Thomas Chalkley, who has been described as a "Quaker missionary-merchant," began his country house in 1723. A half-century later Chalkley's son-in-law turned this early dwelling into the lateral wing of the more pretentious mansion he had built of cream-colored sandstone reputedly brought from England as ballast. When encroaching industry rendered its area of Frankford no longer suitable for residential use, Chalkley Hall was first abandoned and then finally demolished in 1954. At that time the Metropolitan Museum acquired some of the architectural details, but authorities in Philadelphia showed little interest in preserving all or part of what by any standard must be counted one of the city's most important Colonial mansions. tors of Philadelphia architecture were apt to place special emphasis on the architectural details that their training equipped them so superbly to record. With the 1940s and 1950s, attention gradually shifted from individual rooms and specific details to entire buildings, which might on occasion be moved to prevent demolition or to create appealing village museums such as those at Cooperstown, Deerfield, or Old Sturbridge. By the 1960s and 1970s, horizons of the historians and preservationists had expanded still further to encompass whole streets or neighborhoods, and not a few of the older towns and cities could claim a "historic district" listed on the National Register. In these, the integrity of the whole counted for more than the merit of the individual structure, which was often fairly commonplace when judged by the standards of its own time. Philadelphia's Elfreth's Alley is one of the most acclaimed of these historic neighborhoods (figs. 18, 19). Its importance was recognized well before such a concept gained wide acceptance elsewhere.

Figure 19 West portion of north side of Elfreth's Alley. The large blocks into which Thomas Holme divided his 1683 plan of Philadelphia were early cut up by numerous courts and small alleys. This six-foot wide passage between Front and Second streets was opened about 1703 and since the middle of the eighteenth century has been known by the name of one of its principal owners, Jeremiah Elfreth. The first residents of the alley seem to have been largely engaged in occupations associated with the Delaware River, which flows nearby. Those after the Revolution were oriented more toward such domestic trades as carpentry or cabinetmaking. When viewed in combination with major country seats like Woodford or Chalkley Hall, the simple artisans' houses of Elfreth's Alley help complete the picture of life in colonial Philadelphia. Drawn by L.B. MacLeod, 1931. (HABS PA–1103, sheet 2 of 19 sheets)

Figure 20 LaTour Warehouse. Built 1817–18; demolished 1967. Name and scale (21 by 50 feet) serve as reminders that a domestic model lies behind the form of buildings such as this. Thus we speak of meeting*houses*, play*houses*, counting*houses*, and work*houses*, as well as ware*houses*. In the first decades of the nineteenth century, it was still hard to imagine traversing any great distance except by boat. Perhaps we should see the modern concern for the neighborhood in all its aspects as part of a reaction to earlier generations' exclusive interest in important structures built by and for important people. According to this later view, elitism in any form is to be avoided, and folk objects and vernacular artifacts are taken as subjects for serious concern. Luckily for those whose interests lie in this latter area, HABS has usually shown a refreshing willingness to record what all too many of us are apt to take for granted or to dismiss as of little consequence. Surely no architectural survey of Philadelphia could be considered adequate that did not include one of the guard boxes that speak so eloquently of the Victorian era and of the Centennial which they served (fig. 1). Elsewhere in the HABS record of the city the diligent searcher may find a privy—with six private compartments—that once stood behind John Notman's Athenaeum, a cast-iron sidewalk, and even one of the White Towers that served as the architectural symbol of an early purveyor of that peculiarly American commodity, fast food.

Since zoning by use is a comparatively modern development, one could expect to find a number of commercial structures intermixed with residential ones in an area such as Elfreth's Alley. On occasion a shop might be located in a portion of its owner's house. At other times what was essentially a domestic design would be adapted for commercial purposes, as in the case of the LaTour Warehouse that once stood on Water Street (fig. 20). Though usually lacking many of the more obvious esthetic qualities valued by modern recorders of Philadelphia architecture, such commercial structures—especially those of the nineteenth century (fig. 21)—have come to hold increasing interest for historians of urban life as well as for students of building technology. For the latter, Christ Church merits attention not so much for the elaboration of its Early Georgian design as for the technical knowledge that permitted its builders to erect what may well have been the tallest Colonial steeple of its day (fig. 22). And from this aspect of Christ Church it is only a short step to concern for a variety of structures that only a few years ago we should probably not have considered architecture at all. Prominent among these would be the bridges that loomed large in the life of Philadelphia, since its planners carefully chose for it a site between two rivers (fig. 23).

The limitations of the HABS survey of Philadelphia— or of any city— are principally those imposed by time, Figure 21 Business block, Chestnut Street between Third and Strawberry Streets. Built for the most part between 1851 and 1856 from designs of such leading Philadelphia architects as Samuel Sloan, Joseph C. Hoxie, and Stephen D. Button. funding, and, above all, the nature of the project. A record of Strickland Kneass's Chestnut Street span would undoubtedly be welcomed by anyone studying the bridges of Philadelphia. But a full treatment of the subject must inevitably include such notable predecessors as the "Permanent Bridge" (begun 1798; burned 1875), so called because its piers were sunk more deeply than any before them; Louis Wernwag's "Colossus" (begun 1809; burned 1838), the greatest span ever achieved in wood or stone; and Charles Ellet's "Wire Bridge" (opened 1842; demolished 1874), often regarded as the first suspension bridge opened to general traffic. And then there is the present Benjamin Franklin Bridge over the Delaware, considered the longest suspension bridge in the world when it was begun in 1920. To date, the Benjamin Franklin Bridge has not been included in the survey of Philadelphia, presumably because HABS has traditionally omitted most twentieth-century structures, and the earler bridges over the Schuylkill could be neither photographed nor drawn because they had disappeared long before the Survey was begun.

Happily, these deficiencies are not necessarily either permanent or inevitable. Historians are making less and less distinction between the past and the present, recognizing that the present is moment by moment becoming the past. Once the records of earlier centuries are more complete, HABS teams will undoubtedly turn their attention to structures of more recent date. At the same time, the computerization of HABS records that appears to offer such promise for architecture buffs everywhere should appeal especially to students of Philadelphia architecture. Well before another half century has passed, with little more than a touch

As the third iron-arch bridge in the United States, the Chestnut Street Bridge is said to have marked a notable advance in the evolution of tubular-arch construction. Although the pointed arch may have inherent structural advantages, Gothic as a style probably appealed to engineers like Kneass because of the way in which medieval builders permitted their structural systems to function as elements of design. Figure 24 The Jayne Building. Engraved at J.M. Butler's establishment, ca. 1855. The appearance of the owner's name in three places on this print is evidence that despite its size (21½ by 15⅛ inches), it was intended primarily as a "trade card" or advertisement. The building, begun in 1849 from designs of William Johnston and completed under the direction of Thomas U. Walter, was said at the time of its completion to be the most expensive commercial structure in the country. The mortar and pestle that decorate the corners of the front parapet of the Jayne Building are reminders that the funds for its construction came largely from the sale of patent medicine, specifically Jayne's Expectorant. Undoubtedly its eight stories made this one of the tallest buildings of its day, but of even greater interest to historians is the way the architect suppressed the lintels in order to express the verticality of his design, a solution similar to that for which Louis Sullivan was widely hailed nearly half a century later. Since the first architect died when Dr. Jayne's new building was scarcely above its foundations, it may be that his successor deserves more credit for the final design than has commonly been supposed. of the finger they may be able to integrate HABS architectural records with the incomparable collections of prints and drawings owned by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania and the other great libraries and archives of the city. What tantalizing possibilities such a prospect holds!

Cape May, New Jersey: Preservation of a Victorian Town

by

CAROLYN PITTS

Over the past thirty years, Cape May, New Jersey, has undergone a metamorphosis. Existing in a state of genteel seediness, the town suffered widespread destruction when hit by a hurricane in 1962 but then rose to become a bustling tourist mecca. Many guests now come to Cape May to admire one of the largest ensembles of late Victorian frame seaside structures left in the United States. When the summer people disperse, architecture buffs take over, lengthening the short three-month season. They bring economic health to a once-depressed and almost forgotten town.

In the wake of the spring hurricane of 1962, President John F. Kennedy declared the New Jersey coast a disaster area. The federal government offered a 3.5 million-dollar grant from the Urban Renewal Administration(URA) of the Housing and Home Finance Agency (HHFA), today the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), under the Planning Assistance program authorized by Section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954. At a time when urban renewal was infamous for heavy demolition and displacement, the unusual and innovative master plan for Cape May mandated a complete assessment of the town's historic resources with the understanding that one of the basic steps to recovery would be the use of the existing building stock. The legislation for such urban renewal activity, as amended in the Housing Act of 1961, laid the groundwork for the federal preservation laws of the 1960s.

When town government and the planning firm of Kendree and Shepherd insisted that a historic evaluation be built into the master plan, Cape May discovered that its collection of over six hundred hotels, cottages, and churches was a textbook sampling of nineteenth-century architectural styles. One city council member remarked, "Our philosophy was that if we could offer the public something more to see than just the beach and bathing in two months during the summertime, perhaps we could extend the tourist season from early April until late October." Most of the five thousand year-round residents had no idea that they were the custodians of such a rich heritage.

Figure 1 Chalfonte Hotel, Howard and Sewell Streets. The Chalfonte, built in 1876, is the oldest and most ornate large hotel in Cape May. It was originally a four-story boardinghouse, 150 feet long by 40 feet wide, with gas light and running water, but the central block was extended several times. The side porch on Sewell Street was built in 1879. The original owner was Colonel Henry W. Sawyer, a Civil War hero. The contractor was a local Cape May craftsman, Charles Shaw. Photograph by Jack E. In the years since the hurricane there has been a great variety of activity— for renewal, preservation, and rehabilitation—some of it excellent, some of it poor. It is safe to say today that had it not been for federal and state guidance and grants and loans, the quality of preservation would have been far less impressive. Four events made the difference: the HUD project, the placing of a large part of the town on the National Register of Historic Places (without owner consent or even the city government's knowledge, however) in 1971, the designation of the entire town as a National Historic Landmark in 1976, and the Historic American Buildings Survey activity during the summers of 1973, 1974, and 1977. The culmination of these efforts was the Cape May Handbook (Philadelphia: Athenaeum of Philadelphia, 1977), a rehabilitation guide and historic study.

Figure 3 A photograph of the beach at Cape May, ca. 1908. The largest single structure visible on the beachfront is the Stockton Hotel, demolished in 1912. From the collection of Carolyn Pitts.

Cape May began gradually to appreciate what it had. Much of the town had survived because of benign neglect. When the Urban Renewal fund was granted, great care had to be exercised not to succumb to the "level-it-and-rebuild" mentality so prevalent in the 1960s. It was difficult to convince Cape May that the structures they had were, as a district, worth the trouble to restore. Wood rots and salt air is hard on paint. There was a rash of plastic siding in consequence. Proper maintenance of wooden structures was basically a problem in educating property owners.

A number of serious preservation battles began in Cape May after the town was nominated to the National Register in 1970. Because owner consent was not required for nomination at that time—as it is today—the historic district nomination was processed without the knowledge of public officials or many town residents. The mayor, the city council, and developers considered the nomination an impossible obstacle to development. The town was then polarized—pro-preservation residents against supporters of "progressive development"—and the fight became national news. The delicate balance between opposing forces encouraged preparations to document what might be destroyed. In 1973 it seemed wise to structure a recording team of student architects and historians to work using the HABS format to establish what really did exist and to help protect it. There was no immediate source of funding for such work in August 1972 when the Windsor Hotel, one of the coast's finest wood-frame beach front hotels, was slated for demolition because it did not meet New Jersey's fire code standards (figs. 5, 6). An emergency volunteer team came from the University of Pennsylvania and produced a set of measured drawings of exterior elevations and floor plans that were used by the preservation group to convince local and state building inspectors that the hotel was important to the historic fabric of the town. The HABS drawings were used to revise the state codes for historic structures. The presence of the ad hoc team in 1972 made a great difference.

Funding for a full HABS team in the summer of 1973 was obtained from the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) and the Barra Foundation of Philadelphia. In 1974, NEH again funded the project, and the 1977 effort was supported by the National Endowment for the Arts and the Atlantic Richfield Foundation, with additional support from the Philadelphia Athenaeum.

It isn't often obvious, but one of the most valuable contributions HABS teams have made in Cape May and elsewhere is working with local property owners and educating residents while recording. During the three summers when HABS team members were in the town, we encountered every sort of reaction from harassment (a local religious group objected to bearded young men) to cooperation (the volunteer fire company lent us their hook-and-ladder truck under their supervision). Historians and architects worked in tandem, often helping each other—discovering new material in the county courthouse basement or walking on a roof looking at construction changes. First the townspeople were curious, then enthusiastic. In September 1977 the National Landmark ceremony drew hundreds of citizens and dignitaries. A luncheon at the Chalfonte Hotel gave HABS the opportunity to present certificates to owners whose buildings had been recorded.

Occasionally HABS records become invaluable when disaster strikes. Cape May's frame buildings have always been vulnerable to fire. Three great fires in 1856, 1867, and 1878 took a heavy toll on earlier building stock, and on May 18, 1979, fire destroyed the Windsor Hotel on the beach front. HABS measured drawings and photographs provide the best remaining record of what it was (figs. 5, 6).

Although HABS documentation material was superior in itself, one of the primary concerns of both historians and architects was to put it to good use locally. Nonresidents often appreciated Cape May more than the people who lived there. The logical way to remedy this situation was to create a handbook that would include information on what architecture existed, on how it related to nineteenth-century buildings elsewhere, and about how to properly preserve existing structures. Such a guide, if successful, would forever silence the plaint, "But we didn't have any idea it had any value." The

Figure 8 The octagon cottage designed by Orson Squire Fowler. First published in 1848, Fowler's book on architecture advocated modern improvements he thought were healthful and convenient. Hot and cold running water, indoor flush toilets, filtered drinking water, and dumbwaiters were recommended. The great advantages afforded by the octagon shape were that it admitted more light, was easier to heat and cool, saved steps, and yet was 70 percent larger than a square house with the same perimeter. The Chinese ceramic fret tiles, which are set into the porch railing, are unique to this house. It is believed that the tiles were from a pavilion at the 1876 Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia. DESIGN No. 346. PERSPECTIVE VIEW

DESCRIPTION OF DESIGN NUMBER 346

FIRST FLOOR. NO. 346

SIZE OF STRUCTURE: Front, 31 ft. Side, 46 ft.

SIZE OF ROOMS: See floor plans.

HEIGHT OF STORIES: Cellar, 7 ft.; First Story, 10 ft.; Second Story, 9 ft.; Third Story, 8 ft.

MATERIALS: Foundation, stone and brick; First Story, clapboards; Second Story, shingles; Roof, slate.

COST: $4,500, complete, except mantels, kitchen range and heater.

[See page 147 for information about details, specifications, bill of quantities and working plans of this design.]

NOTES

The cost is figured from prices of material and labor in the neighborhood of New York City, June, 1886. In other localities and at different dates the cost will be somewhat modified. The publishers will be glad to acquaint the intending builder with this modified cost at any time.

This design can be reversed, enlarged, reduced or altered to suit special wants. The specifications can be altered, also, to employ different materials that may be best or cheapest in any locality.

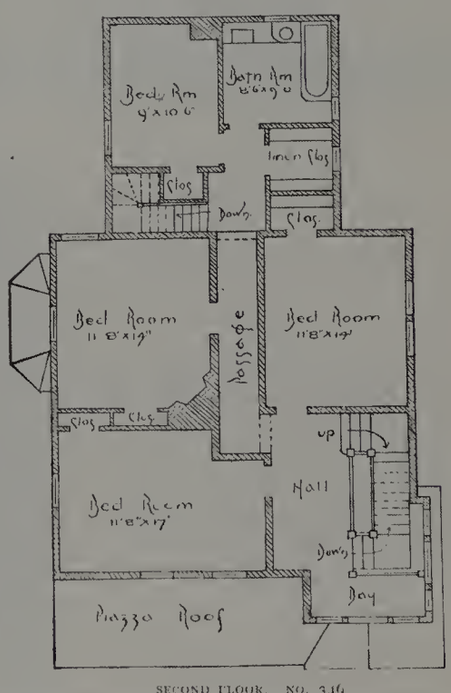

SPECIAL FEATURES.- Square hall, with platform staircase.

Sliding doors between hall and parlor and between sitting-room and dining-room.

Four bed-rooms, a bath-room, ample hall and large closets in the second story.

Three good bed-rooms in the third story.

Cellar under the whole house.

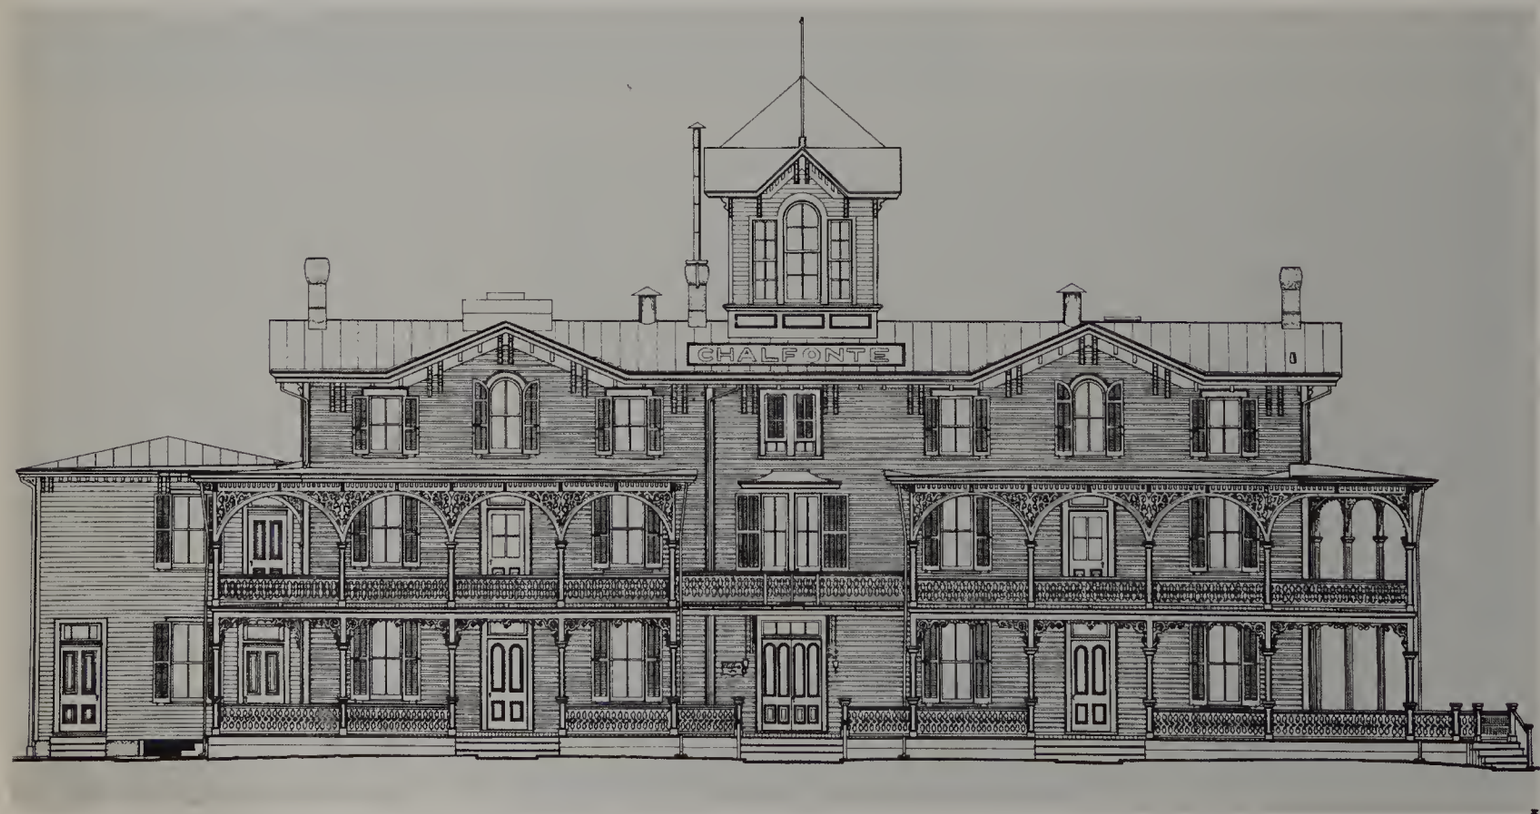

Figure 21 Dr. Emlen Physick Estate, 1048 Washington Street. Attributed to Frank Furness, the Philadelphia architect, this house, constructed in 1878–79, is designed in the Stick style. The bold design, tapering chimneys, steeply gabled roofs, tall proportions, structural framing overlay, and irregular silhouette are typical of Furness's work. The local papers in 1878 were full of comments on the "unusual character" of the new house that had been designed as a year-round residence. This photograph, taken about 1890, shows the large estate that originally had gardens and numerous outbuildings. It is relatively intact today. Photograph from the collection of Carolyn Pitts. handbook produced was funded by the Atlantic Richfield Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts and sponsored by the Philadelphia Athenaeum and HABS. The Arts Endowment further sponsored a series of lectures on such topics as proper rehabilitation and deed research, at the conclusion of which one could receive a free handbook. The goal was to preserve the town's architectural heritage forever and to promote intelligent and sensitive rehabilitation.

Some of the more rewarding aspects of HABS and property-owners working together were the outstanding discoveries made. A great summer cottage, the George Allen House (1863), was verified as the work of nationally known architect Samuel Sloan (fig. 7). The team documented a small octagon (1875), right out of Orson Squire Fowler's work on the "octagon mode of building" (fig. 8). They recorded Fryer's Cottage (1879), having discovered that the architects were Frank Furness and George Hewitt (fig. 10). And it was established that the Evan Morris House (fig. 11) is based on design no. 346 from Shoppell's Modern Houses, a popular architectural pattern book at the end of the nineteenth century (fig. 12).

Cape May still has its problems. Intense real estate development on the beachfront is still going on, now controlled to a certain extent by the zoning board and the Historic District Commission, although at this time the HDC acts only in an advisory capacity. The old Cape May Golf Club, abandoned and in shabby condition, is vulnerable to demolition (figs. 13, 14). The citizens of the town are now fully aware of what it means to monitor new development and unsympathetic restoration, however, and many appear at public meetings to voice opinions.

There is still no year-round industry or any generous patron-philanthropist for the town, so preservation must be funded on a small-scale step-by-step basis. The longer tourist season makes more funds available. In the last several years, a Vintage Home Owners Association, made up largely of the young people who run the very popular bed-and-breakfast inns, has been active, forming a sophisticated restoration constituency. They have made much use of the HABS measured drawings and the Cape May Handbook directives on correct siding, trim, and, most noticeably, Victorian paint colors—which have turned the once ubiquitous white-and-green-shuttered houses into a great variety of handsomely painted cottages. Cape May today is alive and getting better. Local pride in the cultural significance of the town's building stock is now firmly established. Cape May is not a outdoor museum but is part of our environment, healthy economically, providing shelter and delight.

Main Street: Its Revitalization

by

CAROLE RIFKIND

The Historic American Buildings Survey began both as a way to give unemployed architects work during the dire construction slump of the depression and as a way to foster awareness of a rapidly disappearing architectural heritage.

Figure 1 Main Street, Springfield, Massachusetts. This photograph, a copyright deposit submitted in 1908 by William Henry Jackson's Detroit Publishing Company, is characteristic of hundreds produced by that great publisher of souvenir brochures and postcards. Main Street's symbolic significance in the period preceding World War I is demonstrated by its prominence in such photographic imagery. Pride in place is obvious; it would not be surprising to find on the back of a postcard with this picture the typical inscription, "Wish you were here." Jackson, pioneer photographer of the western frontier, joined the Detroit Company in 1897 as part-owner and chief photographer, and he himself photographed townscape and landscape all over the United States. He also trained a team of other photographers whose combined output probably exceeded one hundred thousand images. A substantial portion of these can be consulted today together with the HABS records in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress, where they provide an extraordinarily detailed visual archive of the American environment over the period of a generation. Lot 9150, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–83630)

The first Survey selections reflected the interests and prejudices of the 1930s, when American architectural history as a discipline for study was in its infancy. We can see today that there was a bias toward early domestic architecture, in particular the notably grand, regional, unique, or quaint examples. Although utilitarian structures such as barns, mills, bridges, and the like were covered by HABS, commercial buildings were rarely represented. Only commercial structures with a unique character, such as the iron-fronted Haughwout Building in New York City, were recorded (Gayle, fig. 29).

The commercial streetfront as an ensemble, the uniquely American Main Street that foreigners have so frequently commented on, was not represented in HABS research at that time. Only in special instances—as, for example in New Orleans (Wilson, fig. 12) and Philadelphia (Tatum, figs. 18, 19)—was the focus on streets rather than individual structures. Photographers like William Henry Jackson (fig. 1) and Walker Evans (fig. 2), by contrast, had recognized Main Street as a subject rich in meaning and detail.

The National Historic Preservation Act of 1966 reinvigorated HABS. In giving the federal government a leadership role in the area of historic preservation, this legislation pointed to an approach in which the Survey could spark and sustain state and local preservation efforts. Thus, with local cosponsorship and with growing appreciation for the effectiveness of historic preservation as a tool for downtown revitalization, HABS has conducted projects focusing on a number of main streets over the past decade.

Figure 2 Main Street architecture, Selma, Alabama, December 1935, a photograph by Walker Evans for the Farm Security Administration. Under the direction of Roy Stryker, a pioneer in the didactic use of photography, the Farm Security Administration (FSA) produced more than half a million images of American life between 1935 and 1942, in an effort to garner favorable publicity for the agency's often controversial programs. Main Street was a recurrent theme, documented by a team of brilliant photographers, of whom Walker Evans was perhaps most gifted. Evans was particularly sensitive to architecture and the expressive qualities of building elements and materials. FSA/OWI Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USF342–1146–A)

This attention to Main Street has deep significance, for the Main Street image, though powerful and evocative, has been tarnished by persistent connotations of sameness, obsolescence, and provincialism. Even the briefest overview of a half-dozen projects corrects this impression. Instead, we can see that there is extraordinary geographic, economic, ethnic, and cultural diversity; creative energy and optimism; and resourcefulness and faith in material progress. The clearer perception of these characteristics helps us to better appreciate—and more effectively use—a vital and valuable urban tradition.

Certainly, Main Street in Madison, Indiana—selected as the typical American town by our propaganda office during World War II—suggests the stereotype at its best. The town, platted in 1812 on a low and narrow plain between the Ohio River and limestone bluffs which tower five hundred feet above it, flourished as an entry point to the Northwest Territory for a steady stream of steamboat travelers in years before the Civil War (figs. 3–6). Today, similarly styled brick and cast-iron commercial buildings have a charm and homogeneity that lend the street something of the quality of a movie set. The town was left a quiet backwater by the railroads; and it suffered hard times in the automobile age before its recent rediscovery.

The oldest of HABS main streets is South El Paso Street, which connects downtown El Paso to Juarez, on the Mexican border (figs. 7–10). The town began at the site of a river ford on the trail of Spanish missionaries almost four centuries ago, spread as a settlement on the north-south trade route, and was shaped by the real estate dealings of venturesome entrepreneurs from Kentucky. South El Paso Street enjoyed several generations of prosperity in the glory years of railroad growth after 1880, but today its appearance reflects struggle, the constant struggle for economic success by continuing waves of Mexican immigrants.

A frontier Main Street with a different kind of history is First Street in Benecia. A California town whose origins are in New England, Benecia had ambitions to serve as state capital, a position it held only briefly before Sacramento captured that prize in 1854 (figs. 11–14). The most important fact in Benecia's existence has been its site. Because it is located on San Francisco Bay, it was selected as the seat of an important government arsenal, a time in which the waterfront earned a somewhat dubious reputation. Since the arsenal closed in 1964, the waterfront has been redeveloped as an industrial

The lintels, cornice, and eaves elements of the Foster Building were executed in the Eastlake style, fashionable in the 1870s and reflective of the contemporary love affair with machine production. Note the vigorous articulation of the brackets, with their abruptly reversed curves, and the tooled quality of the cornice, with chamfering, embossing, and other linear embellishments. Elaborations such as these, which were at first made possible by technological advances in mechanized carpentry, were subsequently translated into cast iron, as in this example. park, and the town has faced looming suburbanization within the Oakland-San Francisco metropolitan area.

Main Street, Idaho City, is at the center of a pleasant mountain town about an hour's drive from the state capital (figs. 15–18). Today, it has a placid population of around three hundred, many of whom are retirees. But when Idaho City flourished in the 1860s as a gold mine camp, the population was six thousand. Local historians fondly remember its gamblers, highwaymen, thieves, and robbers. The town was built up with one-story wood or brick storefronts. Although most of the Boise Basin boom towns are dead and gone, Idaho City retains enough early structures to evoke a strong sense of its golden days.

Guthrie, Oklahoma, was another boom town, a town which marked the closing of the frontier. Its main street—Oklahoma Avenue—was born on a day in April 1889 when it was chosen as the starting line for the race to stake out the newly opened Indian Territory for settlement (figs. 19–23). Like Benecia, Guthrie was temporarily a state capital, holding that position long enough to transform its frame and canvas-tent main street into an impressive ensemble of masonry civic and commercial buildings. Guthrie was somnolent for almost three-quarters of a century, but Sun Belt prosperity coupled with historical consciousness are now setting development in motion once again.

There are also some impressive structures on Atlanta's Auburn Avenue, standing out among their more utilitarian neighbors (figs. 24–28). It was on Auburn Avenue that black economic success earned the area the name of "Sweet Auburn" and black political success sparked the civil rights movement of the 1960s. The Odd Fellows Building and Auditorium served as a focal point for social cohesiveness. The Herndon Building and Atlanta Life were headquarters for numerous black entrepreneurs. From the pulpit of Ebenezer Baptist Church on Auburn Avenue, Martin Luther King sounded the call for desegregation. Ironically, the success of the civil rights movement, which allowed blacks to enter the economic mainstream, has contributed to the decline of Sweet Auburn Avenue.

Each main street project undertaken by the Historic American Buildings Survey has been different and each has had a different impact—perhaps as different as the main streets themselves. In Madison, for example, the Survey had both local and national implications. The project was conducted in the summer of 1971, cosponsored by Historic Madison, Inc., an organization founded by local business and civic leaders in 1960, and the Historic Landmarks Foundation of Indiana, a state agency. The research embarked upon helped to sustain strong local historic awareness and assisted the nomination of Madison to the National Register of Historic Places. In 1977 Madison's Main Street was one of three selected by the National Trust for Historic Preservation to serve as a national demonstration project for the coordinated revitalization of a commercial area through historic preservation, physical enhancement, and improved marketing. The following year, another HABS team recorded several commercial buildings that were under consideration for rehabilitation as part of the Main Street project.

Figure 6 Mulberry Street block, Madison, Jefferson County, Indiana. This street facade has a homogeneity which results from the similarity of scale and height but also a diversity which traces the transition from Greek Revival to Italianate forms that occurred during the Victorian period. Faithfully recorded details report on the changes, which proceed in an orderly manner from right to left: numbers 307 and 305 have the modest cornices and simpler lintels common through the 1830s. The windows of numbers 303 and 301 respectively have flat-headed Italianate lintels on consoles and segmentally arched ones defined by keystones and "ears," the first type popular in the 1850s and the second after the mid-1860s. A common heavily projecting and articulated cornice unites both. Measured drawing, 1971, by H. T. Moriarity. (HABS IND–83, sheet 3 of 8 sheets) in 1973. The project gave a much-needed boost to local historical awareness as the "Eighty-Niners," the pioneer generation whose reenactments had kept memories of early days vivid, were fast dwindling. It was sponsored by the Oklahoma Historical Society, a state agency that operates the Oklahoma Territorial Museum. A subsequent development was the formation of the Logan County Historical Society, whose programs have included the administration of Urban Development Action Grants for downtown improvements totaling $800,000. One business leader regards the Logan County Historical Society as the most influential organization in town after city and county government. Guthrie, only a thirty-five-minute drive from Oklahoma City, is increasingly attractive to developers, and several million dollars of rehabilitation is now under way in the downtown business district.

Major reinvestment is also taking place in Benecia, allowing construction of several hundred condominium units and a large marina. Local citizens did not favor nomination to the National Register but an architectural review commission has been established there to ensure that the character of new construction is compatible with the historic ambience of the town.

As recently as ten or fifteen years ago, the historic quality and value of South El Paso Street or Auburn Avenue would not have been apparent to most people. Today, however, we are much more aware of the significance of areas such as these and much more sensitive to the long-neglected need to study the cultural and historic traditions of minority groups. Thus, in Atlanta and in El Paso, HABS researchers have ventured into relatively uncharted areas. Similarly, as "urban action" projects, these surveys went considerably beyond traditional parameters in calling attention to opportunities to capitalize on historic resources in planning for economic development.

Sweet Auburn is a designated Preservation District associated with the Martin Luther King Historic Site, a property of the National Park Service that is currently under development. It is anticipated that the area will become an important visitors' attraction and a major spur to local economic development. The survey undertaken there by HABS in 1979 reflected close coordination between a range of public and private institutions, including the Georgia State Historic Preservation Office, the City of Atlanta Bureau of Cultural Affairs, Office of Economic Development and Urban Design Commission, and the Auburn Area Revitalization Committee. The detailed study of the market potential of Auburn Avenue and recommendations for specific strategies to enhance economic development that were part of the HABS report have affected the direction of local economic planning.

The El Paso project also suggested possibilities for architectural rehabilitation and commercial revitalization. Conducted in the summer of 1980, the project was cosponsored by the City of El Paso and the Texas Historical Commission, which anticipated that a historic district nomination to the National Register would be made. Since then, however, a strong private-sector effort to revitalize one section of the street only, as part of an ambitious redevelopment in the downtown, has, for the time being at least, slowed momentum for historic redevelopment of the study area.

Some may question the appropriateness and efficacy of HABS intervention in local community development. It would certainly be improvident to ignore opportunities to extend and deepen HABS research on these grounds, however. Architectural and historical analysis of main streets inevitably provides evidence of economic development patterns as well, and there are likely to be many occasions when the old adage that experience is the best teacher will prove itself again on Main Street.

For example, HABS projects develop a rich trove of information that can be mined for much-needed research in the history of retail commerce. The history of financing, public improvements, and business leadership are surely other rich fields for investigation. Contemporary planners would benefit from some sharper insights into Main Street's historical responses to changing times. Guthrie, for obvious reasons, had to diversify its concentration of lawyers and realtors. Idaho City was forced to reduce its number of general stores. Madison made an effort to capture the local retail trade.

Similarly, the adaptation of architectural form in previous times may provide useful guidelines for contemporary building rehabilitation and urban design. On Auburn Avenue there is a long history of low-cost renovation. In Madison, there has traditionally been a flair for using locally manufactured building products. In Benecia today, as in times past, new construction shows sensitivity to existing scale and building form.

Main street projects have been effective training programs for future preservationists. Consider the example of Tom Moriarity, in 1971 an architectural student on the Madison project. After he was graduated from the University of Texas in 1974, Moriarity worked at the Historic Sites and Restoration Branch of the state parks agency in Texas until 1975, when he was hired by Historic Madison, Inc., as its first director. Later, he returned to Madison to help coordinate historic preservation, physical improvements, and commercial revitalization as part of the National Main Street Demonstration Project. With several years of experience in Madison, Moriarity went to work in the National Trust's Main Street Center in Washington, D.C., a resource service which has shared its growing expertise with hundreds of communities across the country.

HABS team members have assumed important professional positions in many other niches of historic preservation. For example, John Hnedak, a student architect on the Guthrie project in 1973, is now historian in the northeast regional office of the National Park Service. Darlene Roth, a member of the Sweet Auburn team, is president of The History Group, Inc., a private firm that consults on preservation-related projects. Most HABS team members are not primarily preservationists but archi-

Davis was a member of the lodge and editor of the Atlanta Independent, which began as an Odd Fellow's voice and became a local black newspaper. tects and historians, whose education and professional outlook are substantially enriched by HABS field experience.

By no means are the educational advantages of HAS projects limited to HABS team members. When one considers the heavy volume of tourism associated with these main streets, it is clear that the educational benefits are very broadly distributed indeed.

In downtown Madison, for example, one can visit the Judge Jeremiah Sullivan house museum, a fine example of Northwest Territory Federal-style architecture. Dr. William Hutchings's Office and Hospital there is like an eighty-year-old time capsule of medical practice. The splendid Victorian Shrewsbury House, designed by an outstanding local architect, and the James Lanier house, memorialized because of Lanier's contribution to the Union cause during the Civil War, attract many visitors. Under development is the Schroder Saddle Tree Factory, a unique early industrial site. Walking tour brochures are distributed by Historic Madison, Inc., and the Madison Area Chamber of Commerce. There are Open House Days and a variety of cultural programs that use the historic Main Street ambience to good advantage.

DuBois, takes pride in showing not only the neat surroundings of the First Congregational Church but a prosperous black family seated on the porch of the adjacent house. The second oldest church of its kind in the country, First Congregational was established in 1867 by members of the American Missionary Association. These missionaries arrived in Atlanta at the close of the Civil War to work among and educate the newly freed blacks. Number 359, DuBois Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–83629)

In Guthrie, the Chamber of Commerce provides a town map with a detailed, fact-filled itinerary that suggests forty-two historic sites to visit. In Benecia, the HABS study spurred the publication of an excellent book by Robert Bruegmann, Benecia, Portrait of an Early California Town: An Architectural History (San Francisco: 101 Productions, 1980). The number of inns, restaurants, art galleries, and antique shops that now fill First Street testify to the fact that Benecia has been rediscovered. In Atlanta, the National Park Service estimates potential annual visitors at a half-million or more. Even with its small population, Idaho City manages to operate its old post office as a museum. And on South El Paso Street, where fortune is now at a very low ebb, economic study suggests that historic resources such as foreign flavor, personalized merchandising, and pleasant pedestrian scale may bring tourists and promote economic growth in the area.

Main streets cannot be frozen in time, but neither should they be abandoned heedlessly in the cloudy waters of "progress." There will always be thorny issues that arise in relation to economic development, physical growth, and the management of change in historic areas. The close scrutiny of a HABS project can illuminate characteristics which are particular, unique, and significant and that are essential to the preservation of the sense of place on Main Street.

Documenting Early American Technology: Covered Bridges

by

RICHARD SANDERS ALLEN

As late as fifty years ago, little attention was paid to the subject of bridge building, bridge architecture, or bridge sites. Covered wooden bridges were not accorded the nostalgia and veneration they receive today. In most areas they were simply means of crossing a stream. Early iron bridges went even more unnoticed.

Literature on the history of bridges in America was sparse and spotty, to be found for the most part in local histories from which state and national accounts were laboriously pieced together. Yet the covered bridge figured prominently in the development of American architecture in the nineteenth century. These economical, expedient, and artfully designed wooden structures—"barns over rivers" —which we now observe much as we would examine the skeletons of mastodons, signaled the coming together of several key elements in this country in the nineteenth century: rapid geographic expansion, exploitation of great forests, use of inventive mechanics, and the prevalence of a spirit of enterprise. At their most ambitious these bridges were as brash and heroic as the young nation which fostered them, as can be seen in an 1824 engraving of the great bridge across the Schuylkill at Philadelphia, framed by architect Robert Mills's handsome neoclassical propylaea (fig. 2), or a photograph of a remarkable tripartite bridge spanning the Muskingum and Licking rivers near Zanesville, Ohio (fig. 3). The technological discoveries which they embodied were far-reaching. By 1859 Parisian engineers rebuilding the venerable Pont au Change were making use of the lattice truss system first patented by American inventor Ithiel Town (fig. 4).

Unlike the related histories of early American canals and railroads, the annals of the country's bridge-building and bridge-builders were seemingly lost. Unique and historic bridges stood, but they were taken for granted. No tears

Figure 1 The Fitchburg Railroad used the Montague City bridge in Massachusetts as a crossing for their Turners Falls Branch line, built in 1870. Tolls were collected from horse-and-buggy traffic on the bridge floor below, while iron horses snorted across on the roof. Lit only by two small openings in each span, it was a dark, scary tunnel of noise when a train passed over. A Dr. Watson's horse is reported to have dropped dead of fright in this dark interior. The laminated arches were added in 1901 to support the railroad's heavier rolling stock. When the raging waters of the Connecticut River demolished the structure in March 1936, it was the longest covered wooden bridge in the United States. Photograph by Arthur C. Haskell, 1934. Figure 2 One of the best-known of early American covered wooden bridges was erected in 1812–14 over the Schuylkill River above Philadelphia. The contractor-builder was German-born Lewis Wernwag, assisted by American architect Robert Mills in the capacity of consulting engineer. With elaborately embellished portals, the immense, 340-foot arched span was quickly dubbed "The Colossus," and was likened by actress Fanny Kemble to "a white scarf thrown across the river." The bridge was destroyed by fire on September 1, 1838. Aquatint by Akrell after a drawing by Baron Axel Klinckowström illustrating his Bref om de Förenta Staterne (Stockholm, 1824). Figure 3 Zanesville stands at the confluence of the Muskingum and Licking Rivers, on the Old National Road aross Ohio. Here a unique crossing was devised to span both rivers, a multispanned wooden arch structure in the form of a Y. The bridge was completed in 1832 by Catharinus P. Buckingham, a twenty-four-year-old West Point graduate, and it was not replaced until 1901. Confused motorists who use the Y Bridge's concrete successor today are still occasionally directed to "go to the middle of the bridge and turn right!" Photograph by Lauck Bros., 1900. Figure 4 In their 1858–59 rebuilding of the stone Pont au Change over the River Seine in Paris, French engineers needed a temporary access to piers and pile drivers. were shed or protest mounted as they disappeared from the landscape. Considered unsightly, narrow, and dangerous to automobile traffic (fig. 5), their replacements, often just as narrow and dangerous, were hailed as part of the progress of American transportation.

People's eyes began to be opened, however, by wholesale destruction such as that caused by the great Vermont flood of 1927. In that flood, an estimated two hundred covered wooden bridges in the Green Mountain State were destroyed in the space of forty-eight hours. Fires, both accidental and deliberately set, and gross overloading contributed to the passing of many other outstanding examples of American bridge-building know-how. Then came wholesale replacement projects, such as those of Pennsylvania and Ohio, in which dozens of "inadequate" stream crossings were renewed with spans of steel and concrete (fig. 6). The money was available during the boom times of the late 1920s. Later, in the 1930s, funding for such replacements came from the Works Progress Administration.

Gradually, the situation came to be looked upon with alarm by civil engineers, historians, and budding preservationists endowed with a sense of what constitutes an available engineering heritage, but the wheels of change rolled inexorably on.

Here and there were individuals who made a point of photographing and recording the major dimensions of old bridges, particularly the covered wooden spans, which possessed special romantic appeal. Not until 1933, however, was any national project launched that would serve, even in a small way, to record the images of the vanishing number of covered bridges in the United States.

That year saw the beginning of the Historic American Buildings Survey, which, assembling an archive of early American architecture, surveyed and recorded thousands of structures: public, private, domestic, and industrial. Architectural interest and merit, together with historical associations, were the first criteria. An early report states that "dependencies such as barns and smokehouses—even covered bridges— were recorded."

The first bridge projects were of necessity limited to spans in the immediate vicinity of the unemployed architects enlisted by the American Institute of Architects. These resulted ultimately in photographs of forty-five

Figure 5 Locally maintained and still standing over Schoharie Creek at North Blenheim, New York, this two-lane covered bridge dates from 1855. It was built under the direction of Nicholas M. Powers, who devised a unique plan of hanging the wooden truss superstructure on a single arch (see figs. 24 and 25). Its clear span of 210 feet (only two feet longer than a similar bridge in California) gives Blenheim Bridge the true title of "the longest existing single-span covered bridge in the world." Figure 6 Documentation by casual photographers has enhanced the HABS/HAER collection. This fine arched truss, built in 1840 by contractor J. W. covered wooden crossings, representative of nineteen states. On the face of it, considering that at the time there were probably over four thousand covered bridges still standing in the United States, this may seem a puny contribution. By luck, the scattered representation turned out to be well-chosen.

Perhaps more important, the initial historic buildings survey included detailed architectural drawings of thirty-one of the covered bridges photographed. Professionally prepared and drawn, these were and continue to be a major source of accurate historical and technical data. They can be consulted not only for clues to engineering history but for the building of small-scale models and the creation of full-scale replicas.

Documentation of covered bridges in New England, where the American popular imagination traditionally locates them, is especially good. Three interesting examples were recorded in New Hampshire in the 1930s. The earliest of these lay between Orford, New Hampshire, and Fairlee, Vermont. Originally built about 1850, recorded in 1936, and destroyed by 1937, this dramatic timber lattice truss spanned 438 feet supported only by a solitary central stone pier between abutments of the same material (figs. 7–9). Also destroyed soon after being recorded in 1935 was the Contoocook River covered bridge at Contoocook, in the town of Hopkinton, a bridge which dated from 1853 (figs. 10, 11). Col. Stephen H. Long of the U.S. Army engineers, a native of Hopkinton, had taken out the first of his several bridge patents in 1830. This example of a Long Truss was built by his local agents, the Childs Brothers. Last of these New Hampshire examples, and again lost, was the "New Bridge" or "Henniker Bridge," erected west of Hopkinton in 1863 (figs. 12–14). A special combination of lattice type trusses with arches, it replaced a predecessor carried away by a freshet in the spring of 1852 and was itself taken down after damage suffered in the flood of 1936.

The HABS photographs of covered bridges include a number that appear nowhere but in this collection. Four spans which stood in remote Alabama and Mississippi are among

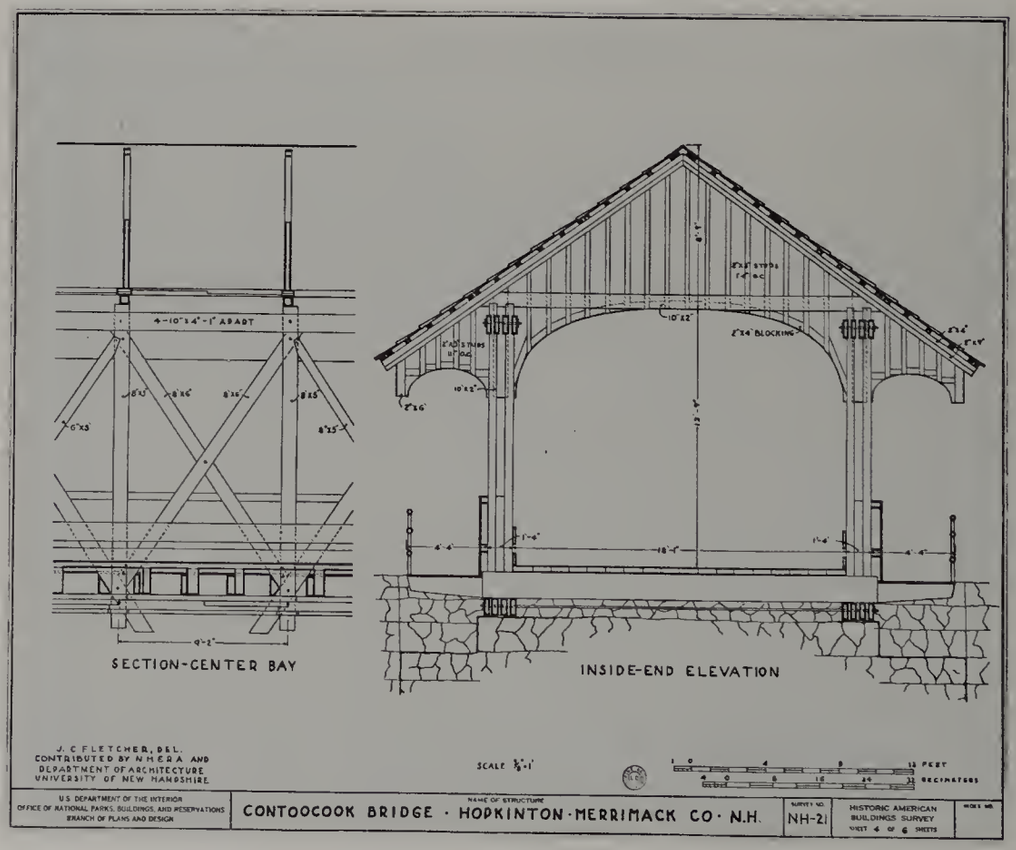

Figure 12 Since this New Hampshire crossing was on the road to Henniker, it was sometimes called the "Henniker Bridge," but it was also known as "New Bridge," because its construction followed that of other covered spans in the Town of Hopkinton. It spanned the Contoocook River west of Hopkinton Village. Aided by a HABS plan (fig. 14), researchers have recently shown the bridge to have been on the design of U.S. patent no. 38,653, issued to John C. Briggs of Concord, New Hampshire, on May 26, 1863. Figure 15 At the time that his lattice truss bridge patent was granted in 1820, Connecticut architect Ithiel Town was professionally engaged in the South. His lattice "mode," as he called it, proved popular in adjacent states. Town's Clarendon Bridge, near Fayetteville, North Carolina, was one of the earliest to use his patented truss. Another example, pictured here, although left to the ravages of weather, survived as late as 1936, spanning Cripple Deer Creek near Allsboro, Alabama. Photograph by Alex Bush, 1936. Figure 16 A number of covered bridges were recorded by HABS only in the nick of time—even after roofs and siding had been removed in the process of demolition. Such was the case in 1934 with the crossing of the Licking River at Butler, Kentucky, a long Burr arch truss structure of three spans. Using native white pine and oak timbers, two contractors from Ohio, J. J. Newman, and F. B. Erwin, erected it in 1871. Photograph by Theodore Webb, 1934. (HABS KY 20–11, LC HABS KY, 96–BUT, 1–2) these (fig. 15), as is a very long roofed structure which spanned the Licking River at Butler in Pendleton County, Kentucky (fig. 16). The Butler bridge, uncovered at the time of recording, demonstrates on a small scale how arched truss units could be repeated indefinitely. Such a capability made possible contemporary American engineering feats like the High Bridge across the Appomattox on the South Side Railway between Petersburg and Lynchburg, Virginia, which stretched 2,400 feet in length and stood 128 feet above the level of the stream (fig. 17).

The three main record types created by HABS each serve a purpose. In addition to photographs, historical data are often included, such as a transcript of the contract for the bridge across the Licking River in Kentucky. The type of information gathered in the 1930s, however, cannot compare with the extensive reports often found in more recent projects. For Bartram's Covered Bridge, which spans Crum Creek between Chester and Delaware County in Pennsylvania, the HABS report written in 1958 fills five pages. Bridge histories prepared since 1969 by the Historic American Engineering Record (HAER) are usually even more extensive.

The third type of record, the sheets of measured architectural drawings produced by HABS—and which, especially in the 1930s, served as the Survey's primary tool—constitute the finest sources of their type. Here the researcher, engineer, and would-be modeler can find authentic details of major American wooden covered bridge truss types, with exact measurements. Isometric views and cutaway drawings show precisely how timbers were fastened and joined (figs. 9, 23, 25). Reproducible copies of the HABS sheets of drawings show the structural framework of covered bridges and other representative bridge types used in America. The following examples are well documented by HABS measured drawings. They include three covered bridges in Ohio, two in New York, two in Pennsylvania, and one in Massachusetts.

In Ohio, HABS has recorded an unusual two-lane or "double-barreled" bridge with two outside sidewalks (figs. 18, 19). It was designed to handle heavy urban traffic across the Mahoning River at Newton Falls in Trumbull County. Devised and patented in 1840 by William Howe of Massachusetts (uncle of Elias Howe, the inventor of the sewing machine), this type had iron rods as an integral part of its design and marked the transition between American wooden and iron bridges. The truss plan was promoted in Ohio by Howe's brother-in-law, Amasa Stone, a Cleveland financier and railroad magnate.

A second Ohio bridge still stands over Big Darby Creek in Union County. It used the patented design of Reuben L. Partridge (fig. 20). For fifty years Partridge, who came to Ohio from New York State, dominated bridge building in the west-central Ohio region. A third Ohio example is a 183-foot single-span bridge which stood over Seven Mile Creek near Collinsville in Butler County (fig. 21). Typical of the patent bridge truss devised in 1869 by Robert W. Smith of Tippecanoe City, it was built throughout the Midwest by his Toledo-based firm.

In Ulster County, New York, HABS recorded Perrine's Bridge, an early example of the arched type of construction first patented by Theodore Burr of Connecticut in 1804 (figs. 22, 23). This type soon found wide favor with builders in New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, and such arched bridges later dominated construction in Indiana for several decades. Over Schoharie Creek in Schoharie County, New York, the Blenheim bridge, recorded by HABS in 1936, remains unique among American covered bridges (figs. 5, 24, 25). A two-lane span with a single central supporting arch, it was erected in 1854–55 by Vermonter Nicholas M. Powers. Its 210-foot clear span makes it today the world's longest single-span covered wooden bridge.

For Johnson's Mill Bridge over Chickies Creek, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, the HABS collection has an unusually fine set of seven measured drawings illustrating many aspects of this 64-foot single-span Burr Truss covered bridge of 1866 (fig. 26). The drawings include cutaways that show the stone parapets, typical of the abutments found with many Pennsylvania bridges. Truss details are those used in later bridges of the Burr type down to the last mortice-and-tenon joint, nut, bolt, and washer.

Pennsylvania's Waterford Covered Bridge, in Erie County, represents a typical Town lattice-type covered bridge, in the details of both its substructure and superstructure (fig. 27). Invented and patented in 1820 by Ithiel Town of New Haven, Connecticut, this wholly American bridge truss was composed of easily obtainable latticed planks. Much less difficult to erect than an arch bridge, the lattice-type bridge was built in all the Eastern seaboard states from Maine to Mississippi. The architect-patentee received a good income from royalties paid for the use of this invention, which was also used abroad (fig. 4).

The Montague City Covered Bridge across the Connecticut River in Franklin County, Massachusetts, was the longest in America at the time of its loss in the flood waters of March 1936. Although the exterior and interior photographs made for HABS by Arthur Haskell in 1934 are better than usual for this period (figs. 1, 28), they can but partially reveal the bridge's construction. Only measured drawings could have fully explained William Howe's wood-and-iron truss plan, with its addition of auxiliary arches in five spans covering 754 feet (fig. 29). This structure served vehicular traffic inside and a single-track railroad on its roof. One can imagine the fright of a skittish horse when caught on the bridge as a train came rumbling across overhead.

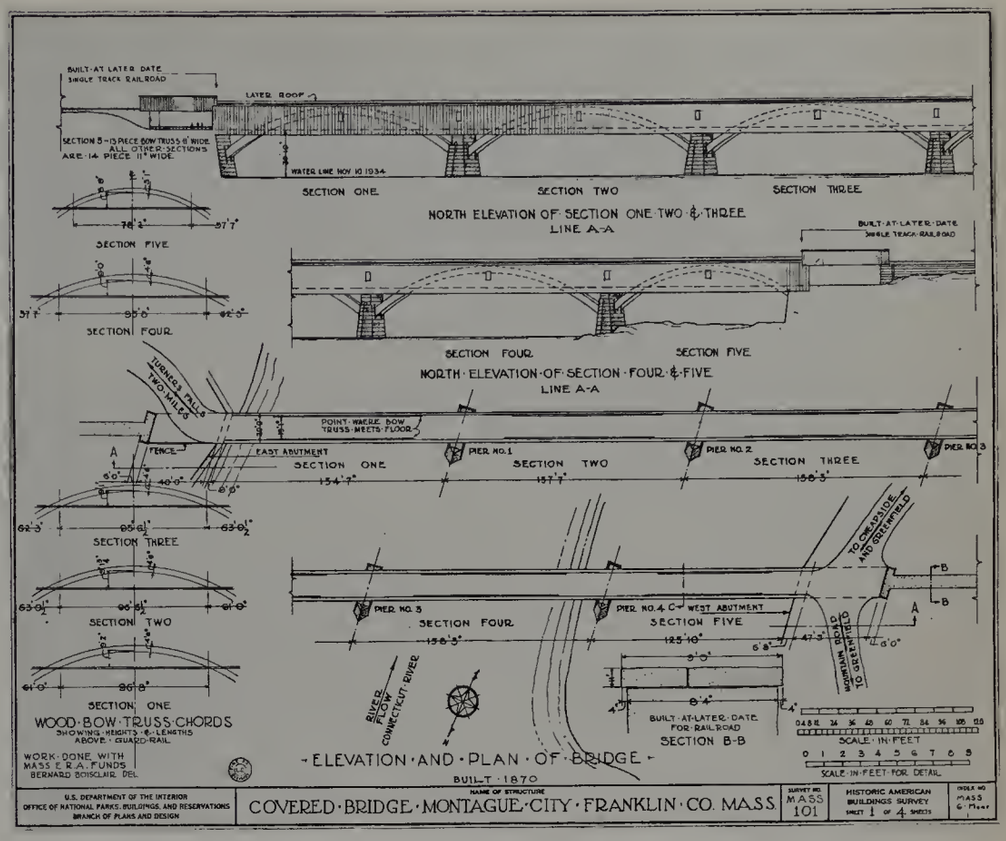

Figure 29 Measured drawing for the covered bridge at Montague City in Franklin County, Massachusetts. Drawing by Bernard Boisclair. (HABS MASS–101, sheet 1 of 4 sheets)

Though small and little-known, the nucleus of covered bridge photographs and drawings from the early 1930s in the HABS collection was widely appreciated from its beginnings by a handful of engineering historians and later by the growing number of people who became interested in covered bridges as a hobby. Since the original HABS activities in the 1930s, the National Park Service has continued to make records of historic structures that come under its care. The Historic American Engineering Record, established in 1969, now covers the field of historic bridges: wooden, wire, iron, stone, and concrete.

A joint project of the National Park Service, the Library of Congress, and the American Society of Civil Engineers, HAER continues to provide documentation on engineering landmarks and significant structures, including numerous bridges throughout the nation, so that even if the structures themselves are destroyed, permanent records will remain. HAER does more than take

Figure 30 Documentation has improved in the past half a century. The HABS files on the 1859 Suspension Bridge over the Kaskaskia River at Carlyle, Illinois, contained little more than this 1936 photograph and a historical note that "Griffith D. Smith of Pennsylvania" was its builder. Photograph by Clark Bullard, 1936. (HABS ILL–225, LC HABS ILL, 14–CARL, 1–3)

Figure 31 The exhaustive coverage given in 1969–71 to John Roebling's Delaware River Aqueduct between Lackawaxen, Pennsylvania, and Minisink Ford, New York, includes forty-nine pages of data and photographs, plus field notes. photographs and prepare original measured drawings. Today a bridge nominated for inclusion in the Record may become the subject of extensive historical reports, technical analysis, photogrammetric stereopairs, and, in some cases, even motion pictures. Thus today's complete files are usually much richer than those created in the 1930s. When we compare the single photograph and three data pages prepared by HABS in 1936 for the 1859 wire suspension span across the Kaskaskia River at Carlyle, Illinois (fig. 30), to HAER's 1969–71 records for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Aqueduct (fig. 31) at Lackawaxen, Pennsylvania, of 1847–48, the difference becomes clear. The latter, documenting the earliest surviving work by John Roebling and probably the oldest suspension bridge in the United States, include field notes (1968), four sheets of drawings (1969), fourteen photographic copies of historical documents and photographs, three aerial (1971) and sixteen ground-level photographs (1969), and twelve pages of written historical information (1971).

Between 1969 and 1976, nearly a hundred historic bridges in ten states—including thirteen of the covered wooden variety—were added to the structures illustrated with technical information at the Library of Congress. Others have been researched and photographed since 1976 and still more await nomination to the National Register of Historic Places. The gathering of information and the work of evaluation is a tremendous and continuing process, involving research, travel, people with expertise, and, of course, the necessary allocation of funds. Many significant American bridges await thorough HABS/HAER documentation, especially the metal trusses that evolved from wooden trusses in the mid-nineteeth century. Thousands of these structures are threatened by massive federal programs to improve the primary and secondary road systems in America.

Begun itself a half century ago, the HABS and HAER effort has yielded photographs, measured drawings, and related documentation of bridges and other engineering and industrial structures. These records remain continuously available both in the Library of Congress and through copies in hundreds of research collections in this country and abroad. They provide a great resource for the growing number of historians, engineers, architects, and preservationists and for the general public interested in this nation's technological achievements.

Recording a Room: The Kitchen

by

RODRIS ROTH

The fireplace remains a symbol of the kitchen even though the cook stove long ago replaced it. Of considerable width, depth, and height, and often having a bake oven in the back wall, the fireplace of the 1600s was modified in the 1700s, its dimensions reduced and the oven moved next to it. One of the most important innovations in the history of the kitchen was the cook stove, which evolved in the 1830s and 1840s. Mass produced, it contained and controlled the heat source. Furthermore, the height of its cooking surface meant less bending and lifting for the cook.

Figure 1 The open hearth reigns in this nineteenth-century kitchen. A semi-cylindrical roasting oven has been placed before the fire, however, to supplement it in cooking. One woman prepares a fowl for roasting while the other rolls out pastry for the top crust of a pie. Various utensils have been hung on the walls, placed on shelves and tables, and stored on the floor. The basket on the floor in front, filled with food, is as accurately portrayed as the rest of the room, but it serves as well as a traditional artistic device symbolizing the earth's bountiful harvest. The illustration is the frontispiece in Esther A. Howland, The New England Economical Housekeeper, and Family Receipt Book (Worcester: Published by S. A. Howland, 1845). (LC–USZ62–83637)

As the stove became generally available in the nineteenth century, it took over the fireplace to make use of the flue. Sometimes a stove was placed in the fireplace recess, but more often it stood in front of the opening, hiding the fireplace, which was then usually closed up. With the advent of the stove, fireplaces were no longer required for either cooking or heating. The great hulking chimney stack with many flues became obsolete. Beginning about 1850, newly built houses had only a single narrow chimney or stovepipe in the kitchen to vent a wood or coal stove.

With the introduction of gas and electricity, the stove could be located practically anywhere and the chimney was completely eliminated. Gas ranges were in general use by 1900 and electric stoves about four decades later. Although the pipe connection fixed the location of a gas stove once it was decided on, an electric stove could be moved about and plugged in wherever there was an electric outlet. Another major change in the kitchen, the result of scientific studies of the work process, was the widespread appearance in the 1940s of the continuous work surface, which used cabinets and equipment of standardized size as components and linked stove, sink, and refrigerator.

The Historic American Buildings Survey records all

Figure 2 Kitchen mantel, Morris Goodwin House, vicinity of Salem, New Jersey. The focus of this kitchen—and many others in America— remained the fireplace, even though the hearth was no longer used in cooking. Its replacement, the cast-iron cooking range, was connected to it to make use of the flue. With the introduction of the electric stove, which could be plugged in anywhere, the connection became symbolic. Photograph by George Neuschafer, 1941. (HABS NJ–690, LC HABS NJ, 17–SAL.V, 6–8) these types of kitchen arrangements and more with plans, elevations, sections, details, data sheets, and photographs. Photographs and drawings show detached kitchens and other outbuildings, such as ice, smoke, and milk houses, along with a few covered walkways, well covers, root cellars, pantries, cupboards, and wine cellars. Included in the survey are examples dating from the seventeenth to the twentieth century. Some are associated with simple cabins and others with modest dwellings, palatial mansions, or historic house museums. They are located in both rural and urban areas in all parts of the country, from New Jersey to Oregon and Wyoming to South Carolina.

Although the evolution of the kitchen can be traced in the HABS collections, the material does not lend itself to an in-depth examination of the room. Sources such as advertisements, directories, housekeeping manuals, cookbooks, women's magazines, architectural books, houseware catalogs, and trade journals prove far more fruitful—and direct—for a study of the kitchen. They provide specifications, names, dates, materials, and locations, information seldom found in the HABS collections. In addition, they often provide a clue to contemporary attitudes and give contemporary comments and opinions. Indeed, Siegfried Giedion used such materials in writing Mechanization Takes Command:

Figure 3 Mantel in kitchen, Smith House, Smithville, Alabama. As long as it stands, a fireplace may continue to serve its original functions of cooking and heating. Although nothing is known about this scene, the casual array of boxes, jars, tins, bags, and a scale lining the mantel shelf suggests that the fireplace here was still being used with some regularity in 1934. Figure 4 Interior—south wall—of the kitchen, Maj. John Bradford House, Kingston, Massachusetts. A popular image of colonial America is the New England fireplace of cavernous dimensions in a low-ceilinged room with exposed beams, paneled walls, and wide floor boards. It is a valid image that is documented here. Starting about the second quarter of the eighteenth century, the brick bake oven was built adjacent to the kitchen fireplace rather than within it. A Contribution to Anonymous History (New York: Oxford University Press, 1948), still the best, most interesting, and most thought-provoking study of the kitchen.

Recording the kitchen was not the purpose of HABS. The Survey's purpose was—and is—to record architecture. This determined what to photograph and draw—which building, rooms within the building, and features within the room were selected. A further purpose of the Survey was to record buildings before they disappeared. Consequently, HABS concentrated its initial resources on early structures, and understandably so. The result in regard to kitchens was a great number of fireplaces being recorded because they were an architectural feature in early houses. As a bonus, some views might include a stove, sink, or other piece of kitchen equipment because it was in front of the mantel or next to a door or another architectural element. These accidental glimpses not only show us kitchens but also how some people lived in old houses, introduced new technology, and modified their surroundings. There is much not shown, however. Whether the house was lived in by choice or necessity, whether it was a single-family dwelling or divided into apartments, and whether there were more kitchen appliances and what they were are questions not answered by HABS.

Thus some cautions about using

Figure 24 "An Electric Kitchen." Contemporary pictures of kitchens do not necessarily show the newest equipment, arrangements, or techniques. They do, however, record the room as seen by someone familiar with it and reveal prevailing attitudes and practices, especially when they show people using the room. This kitchen is specifically identified as "sketched from one in operation," which suggests the newness and novelty of electricity as a fuel in 1894. In fact, it had just been introduced into the kitchen. Although today's appliances may appear more streamlined, their arrangement remains about the same. Figure 27 Kitchen, Brown-Wagner house, Brownsville, Texas. Although the Brown-Wagner house was built in 1894, the kitchen dates from about the 1940s, judging from the equipment. Presumably, it was remodeled. At that time, the cabinet, counter, and sink that formed a continuous work surface, the semicircular shelves framing the window, and the "table top" stove were popular and readily available. the collections are in order. The information gathered varies from structure to structure. Sometimes it is copious, and other times it is skimpy. Even if construction dates are provided, some of what is seen in any photograph may be more recent. Whatever was in view of the camera was recorded. Room function may have changed. In some houses, for instance, the original kitchen had become a living room by the time the house was surveyed. Yet often a room's compass point location was recorded but no indication was given of the room's use at the time it was documented, with all that that might have told us about shifts in perceptions and customs. Alterations and additions may not have been noted or even recognized at the time the building was recorded. Later users of the collections can easily be led astray. It is well to remember that with HABS materials one is dealing with raw and often incomplete data, and considerable expertise is required in identifying and using it.

Occasionally, kitchens were recorded for their own sake, of course, as were other rooms. I examined virtually all the HABS photographs for this brief foray into the kitchen. I found approximately fifteen photographs specifically of kitchens, six of stoves, and eight of the fireplace-and-stove combinations. There were about one hundred photographs of kitchen fireplaces, however. The preponderance of fireplaces is explained in part by the interest in recording early buildings before they disappeared and in part by its symbolic import. As buildings of more recent date are surveyed, the opportunities to include kitchens increases.

The careful renderings of bake ovens and fireplaces, although not unique to HABS, constitute a useful group of material readily available in one place for the study of these important kitchen features. For instance, size and shape can be compared, regional characteristics charted, and construction variations examined, helping us to understand cooking routines and, in turn, living patterns. As usual, with any of the HABS pictures, one must be alert for remodeling, repairs, and restoration of the object recorded.

Floor plans and elevations are another resource for the study of kitchens. One must check all the drawings and photographs of a given structure, however, as equipment shown on a floor plan may not be recorded on the elevation, or vice versa. In any event, HABS drawings can tell us about the size and location of fireplaces and ovens and the placement of more recent equipment. They reveal the orientation of the kitchen and its relation to the rest of the house, providing insights into, say, concepts of space and social customs.

Finding measured drawings of a Rumford Roaster was serendipitous. Once seen, there is no mistaking the "new Contrivance for roasting Meat" invented in the late 1700s by the American-born Sir Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford (figs. 13, 14). All one ordinarily sees of the built-in roaster is the circle iron frame with its door, repeating the roaster's shape and punctuated with shiny brass knobs, buttons, fasteners, and an oval name plate. How the roaster was constructed and installed can be better understood thanks to the HABS drawings. They add to the limited information available on the roaster beyond Rumford's own writings.

Figure 28 East wall of drawing room, 271 Meeting Street, Charleston, South Carolina. The purpose of this picture—and indeed of the Historic American Buildings Survey—is to record the architectural setting, not the kitchen. This is clear from the title of the photograph and accompanying instruction, "Note pseudo-door at right for purpose of symmetry." Nevertheless, in recording this room the HABS team, as in many other instances, inadvertently recorded the kitchen too. Photograph by C. O. Green, 1940. (HABS SC–217, LC HABS SC, 10–CHAR, 12–1)

There is a revival of interest in the kitchen among historians, curators, and the public. The recent emphasis on history "from the ground up" has helped to focus attention on the household. The women's history movement has been a potent force, too, in turning our attention to some of the fundamental issues of housekeeping and the role of women. Curators of historic houses and museums, of course, have long been exploring home life. As the guardians of material culture, displaying the kitchen and its contents, they have fostered the study of household technology. All of this helps us to look anew at the past and at our sources for its study. The HABS material presents a fragmented picture of the kitchen because it focuses on architectural highlights. Nevertheless, as more is learned about household technology and as our understanding of daily life expands, various facets of the HABS collection may prove to be useful resources for studying the past.

Fittings and Fixtures: Miscellaneous Americana in Survey Photographs

by

DENYS PETER MYERS

It takes more than a week to give even a fleeting glance to the thousands of photographs in the Historic American Buildings Survey Collection in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress. Anyone who looks through the entire HABS photograph collection, however hastily, is almost certain to be lured astray into fascinating byways unconnected with the principal subject of his or her research. Delightful surprises, as well as occasional disappointments, wait there for the researcher even faintly interested in Americana.

My primary purpose in looking through the multitudinous loose-leaf binders containing HABS photographs was to find illustrations of nineteenth-century lighting fixtures in their original settings. In all, I noted almost three hundred pictures of lighting fixtures—as distinct from movable lighting devices—but every so often other fixtures, such as plumbing, heating, and hardware, were of such interest that they fairly begged for attention. Occasionally, decorative features were so outstanding that I could not pass them by. And although I was not specifically seeking them, photographs that illustrated such widely diverse subjects as Victorian domestic furniture and wheeled vehicles turned out to be so beguiling that they compelled my notice.

To begin with the most unexpected surprise of all, I must mention a particularly fine nineteenth-century carriage recorded by the Survey. A 1937 interior photograph of the carriage shed of the Morris House, a property of the New Haven Colony Historical Society now known as the Pardee-Morris House, shows a resplendent "Scroll-Back Quarter Caleche Coach," illustrated as no. 109 in the

Figure 1 Stair hall, Wickham-Valentine House, Richmond, Virginia. The Wickham-Valentine House, now a part of the Valentine Museum, was built in 1812. Recent research by Pamela J. Scott and Edward F. Zimmer has demonstrated that the house, long attributed to Robert Mills, was in fact designed by Alexander Parris (Zimmer and Scott, "Alexander Parris, B. Henry Latrobe, and the John Wickham House in Richmond, Virginia," Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians 41:202–11). In 1854 the house was lavishly redecorated in the mid-century Neo-Rococo style. Two splendid gas chandeliers installed in 1854 remain, one in the parlor and one in the hall. Both are probably by Cornelius and Baker of Philadelphia. The hall chandelier is two-tiered, with a three-light section lighting the upper hall. Photograph by Frederick Doveton Nichols, 1940. (HABS VA, 44–RICH, 5–4)

Figure 2 Carriage shed, Morris House, New Haven, New Haven County, Connecticut. The Morris House was given to the New Haven Colony Historical Society by a member of the Pardee family. The carriage shed was added in the 1930s. The coach bears two labels of Lawrence, Bradley & Pardee and is illustrated in that firm's catalog. Curiously, another New Haven coachmaker, G. & D. Cook & Company, used the same wood engraving to illustrate the "Hamilton Coach" in their 1860 catalog. The Cook coach was priced at $1,200. The extant model has silver-plated hardware and space for two footmen behind. It is as elaborate a carriage as was ever made in America. A decade earlier the coachman's box would probably have been concealed by a lavishly trimmed hammercloth like the one on the Saltonstall coach in the Smithsonian Institution, but by the 1860s hammercloths were obsolescent. The quarter caleche is now on loan to the Eli Whitney Museum in New Haven. Photograph by James Rainey, 1937. (LC HABS CONN, 5– NEWHA, 8A–1)

1862 catalog of the New Haven coachmaker Lawrence, Bradley & Pardee (fig. 2). It sold for $800 to $1,000 in an age when laborers were paid $1 a day.

Other wheeled contrivances in HABS photographs that are of interest include an ancient wheelbarrow at the Major Isaac Foster House at Manchester, Massachusetts, a wooden hand truck at the Swetland Store in Wyoming, Pennsylvania, a later hand truck at the Union Pacific Station in Cheyenne, Wyoming, and a Concord stagecoach in a HABS copy of a nineteenth-century photograph of Chugwater, Wyoming (fig. 4). Nor should one forget the handsome sleigh at Springwood, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's house, in Hyde Park, New York. The most impressive of all nineteenth-century wheeled contrivances—the steam locomotive—is well represented by six iron horses in the roundhouse of the Virginia and Truckee Railroad in Carson City, Nevada (figs. 5, 6).

In interior views, HABS photographs record eye-catching decorative features of buildings. I found, for instance, a few examples of etched-glass door panels, of which those in the Governor Henry Lippitt House in Providence, Rhode Island, were the most outstanding (fig. 7). Other details, such as wallpapers or carpets—for which the color was lost in black-and-white photographs—were not frequently captured. One wallpaper at least should be mentioned, however, as it is a rare example called "Décor Chasse et Pêche" or "Renaissance," first issued by S. Lapeyre in 1847 and later by Jules Desfossé. It adorns the parlor

Figure 4 Manager's house and original station-hotel, destroyed in 1918, of the Cheyenne-Black Hills Stage Line, Chugwater, Platte County, Wyoming, now part of the Swan Land and Cattle Company. This station was in the first division of the Cheyenne-Black Hills Stage and Express Line, and the team of four appears ready to pull out a Concord-type coach driven by one George Lathrop, accompanied by an unidentified sharpshooter and a female passenger holding an anxious white puppy. Copy of an 1884 photograph. (HABS WYO–71, LC HABS WYO, 16–CHUGW, 1–3)

Figure 5 Two-horse sleigh with coachman and footman in livery and an unidentified woman riding in it, presumably at Springwood, Hyde Park, Dutchess County, New York. This historical photograph was incidentally copied together with other family photographs when a HABS team recorded the Franklin Delano Roosevelt House in the summer of 1941. The site is now the Franklin D. Roosevelt National Historic Site. (HABS NY–4, LC HABS NY, 14–HYP, 5–)

Figure 6 Virginia and Truckee Railroad Roundhouse, Carson City, Ormsby County, Nevada. The Virginia and Truckee Railroad operated nineteenth-century steam locomotives and wooden passenger coaches until it ceased operations in 1950. The roundhouse was constructed between 1872 and 1874. The Virginia and Truckee ran between Virginia City, Nevada, and Truckee, California. It was one of the most famous short line railroads in the world during the 1870s when it carried the immense wealth of silver produced by the Comstock Lode. The antique rolling stock has starred in numerous motion pictures. HABS photograph, 1939. (LC HABS NEV, 13–CARCI, 6–3)

Figure 7 Dining room door detail, Governor Henry Lippitt House, Providence, Providence County, Rhode Island. The splendidly finished Lippitt House was designed by Henry Childs and erected between 1862 and 1865. It retains its original fittings and much of its original furniture. The black walnut and curly maple dining room doors contain lavishly ornamented etched-glass panels and are fitted with silver-plated hardware. Deer, a favorite motif in mid-nineteenth-century dining rooms, appear on the carved black walnut built-in sideboard and on the bronze gas chandelier as well as on the glass door panels. One of Sir Edwin Landseer's paintings may have been the source for this etched-glass vignette. His Monarch of the Glen and Stag at Bay were two of the most frequently reproduced paintings of the last century. Photograph by Laurence E. Tilley, 1958. (LC HABS RI, 4–PROV, 136–28)

Figure 8 South wall of the library, Thomas Jefferson Southard House, Richmond, Sagadahoc County, Maine. An Italianate mansion, the Southard House was built in 1855. The elaborately appointed parlor is papered in a splendid sharp blue, golden brown, white, and gold paper on a soft gray field. One of the most spectacular French panel sets, this pattern was designed in 1846 by an artist named Wagner and first issued by S. Lapeyre in 1847. It was reissued by Jules Desfossé in 1859–60. Another set survives in a house in Portland, Maine. The Southard parlor is further enriched by a lavishly carved white marble mantelpiece and an ormolu chandelier by the Philadelphia gas fixture firm of Cornelius and Baker. The house is now the St. Alexander Nevsky Foundation, a Russian Orthodox geriatric home established by a Romanov princess. Photograph by Dwight R. Sturgis, 1971. (LC HABS ME, 12–RICH, 2–9)

Figure 9 Interior detail, tin sheathing on walls and ceiling, of the Sig Sautelle Circus Training House (also known as the George Satterly House), Homer, Cortland County, New York. This octagonal structure was built in 1902 for George Satterly (1850–1928), a circus owner. Satterly's family occupied the first two floors, and the third floor was a training area for acrobats. Satterly adopted the stage name Signor Sautelle—evidently pronounced sig-nor, as his friends called him Sig. He started his circus in 1875 and eventually sold his enterprise to a Barnum affiliate in 1904. The training house had become a restaurant by 1964. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1966. (LC HABS NY, 12–HOM, 2–4)

Figure 10 Parlor (seen from the entrance vestibule, looking northeast) of the Francis J. Dewes House, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. The parlor of this beer baron's mansion is almost manic in its ostentation. The swirling Neo-Rococo forms are far more heavy than their eighteenth-century prototypes. The Watteauesque ceiling painting is the most charming feature of the room. There are unintentionally comic touches, such as the putto in the center of the picture who seems about to make an impolite gesture and the resigned expression of the caryatid at the left. The room was intended to overwhelm—and it succeeds. Photograph by Harold Allen, 1964. (LC HABS ILL, 16–CHIG, 45–3)

Figure 11 Window latch, central room, first floor, north wall, Stephen Girard Country House, Philadelphia, Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania. Casement windows are rare in eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century American buildings. This window latch is of a distinctly European type. Possibly Stephen Girard's French antecedents explain his preference for casements rather than double-hung sash. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1962. (LC HABS PA, 51–PHILA, 226–21)

Figure 12 Classroom doorknob, Fremont School, Salt Lake City, Salt Lake County, Utah. The Fremont School was designed by Henry Monheim and built in 1890. A Salt Lake Tribune article published on January 1, 1891, stated: "The finest structure ever erected in this city for educational purposes is the fourteenth district school building built the past year." Elaborately ornamented brass hardware cast by the cire perdu (lost wax) process was standard from the 1870s until after the turn of the century. Similar hardware patterns were stock items in the mail order catalogs of Sears Roebuck and Montgomery Ward. Photograph by P. Kent Fairbanks, 1967. (LC HABS UTAH, 18–SALCI, 7–9)

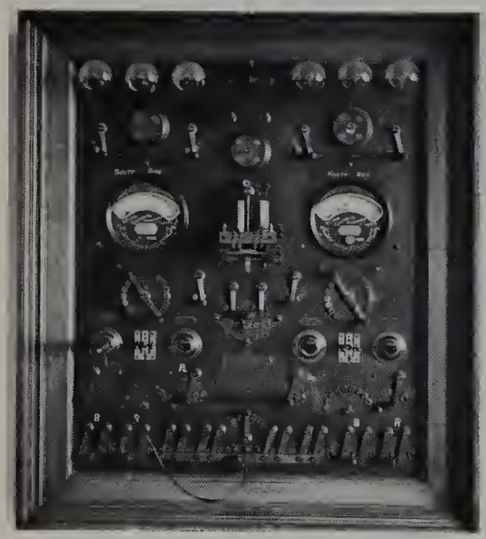

Figure 13 Fire alarm panel of 1894, City Hall and Opera House, Bozeman, Gallatin County, Montana. The Bozeman City Hall and Opera House was built in 1887–90 to house the general city offices, city jail, and fire station on the first floor, a civic auditorium or opera house on the second floor, and rental offices on both floors. The building was designed by Byron Vreeland, a local architect who died in 1889. Architect George Hancock altered the original design and supervised the completion of the building. In 1916 the name of the Opera House was changed to Municipal Theater. The building was demolished in 1966. The presence of a fire station in the multipurpose structure accounts for the fire alarm panel. It was thoroughly up-to-date equipment when it was installed in 1894. Photograph by Al Huntsman, 1965. (LC HABS MONT, 16–BOZ, 1–12)

Figure 14 Carriage block on Government Street, Mobile, Mobile County, Alabama. Such elaborate stone mounting blocks are rare examples of street furniture. It is not clear whether this one was erected at private or municipal expense. The style of the carving suggests a date in the third quarter of the last century. The height of the platform indicates that the block was designed for mounting horses rather than carriages. Photograph by W. N. Manning, 1934. (LC HABS ALA, 49–MOBI, 37A–1) of the Thomas Jefferson Southard House of 1855, recently a Russian Orthodox home for the aged, in Richmond, Maine (fig. 8). Numerous churches of the 1840s and 1850s and meeting halls, such as the Masonic Temple of 1878 in Belfast, Maine, contain architectural frescoes executed in illusionistic grisaille. Both ceilings and walls of the "Sig" Sawtelle Circus Training House (also known as the George Satterly House) in Homer, New York, are sheathed in stamped metal, one of the least usual of all wall treatments (fig. 9). At the other end of the decorative gamut is the parlor of the Francis J. Dewes House of 1894–96 in Chicago, later the Swedish Engineers' Society. That parlor is one of the very few—perhaps the only—examples in America of a kind of Wilhelmine Baroque-Rococo style (fig. 10). It was a style more characteristic of Norddeutscher-Lloyd Line ships of the 1890s than of residential interiors in the United States. A Hungarian-born architect, Arthur Hercz, who was trained in Vienna, confected it for the brewer Francis Dewes.

Hardware, an often overlooked incidental to architecture, can also be studied in the photographs. Curiously, only a single window latch appears ever to have been photographed by the Survey. That lone example is a rare casement latch dating from around 1800 in the Stephen Girard Country House in Philadelphia (fig. 11). Door hardware, however, does appear with fair frequency, as in the knob, escutcheon plate, and latch plate of an Eastlake pattern in the Fremont School of 1890 in Salt Lake City (fig. 12). Among other curious and rare miscellaneous bits of hardware is an hourglass holder, probably dating from about 1730, in the Rocky Hill Meeting House at Amesbury, Massachusetts. A fire alarm signal panel of 1894 was photographed in the City Hall and Opera House at Bozeman, Montana (fig. 13). And a fine set of old scales appears in photographs of the Elisha Atherton Coray Mill in Exeter Township, Pennsylvania. A considerable amount of early cast-iron street furniture and other exterior ironwork was photographed in Boston and Chicago, and even more was recorded in Mobile, Alabama. Oddly enough, the photographic representation of ironwork in New Orleans is decidedly skimpy, but HABS measured drawings remedy the deficiency. A highly unusual piece of street furniture, an elaborate masonry mounting block, stands on Government Street in Mobile, Alabama (fig. 14).

The HABS photographs provide some data on nineteenth-century plumbing fixtures, although opportunities were missed because such material was not considered interesting until

Figure 15 Bathroom, David Davis Mansion, Bloomington, McLean County, Illinois. The house was built in 1870–72 from plans by Alfred H. Piquenard for Judge David Davis. Davis was a legal and political associate of Abraham Lincoln, a member of the U.S. Supreme Court (1862–77), and a U.S. senator (1877–83). George McIntosh was the plumbing contractor. The painted china wash basin set in marble and the metal-lined wood-encased bathtub are typical of their period. Water pumped manually from the basement to an attic tank and distributed by gravity supplied the extant original faucets of the washstand, tub, and shower. The house is now a museum of nineteenth-century living. Illinois State Historical Library photograph. (LC HABS ILL, 57–BLOOM, 2–7)

Figure 16 Shower stall, Ivinson Mansion (now the Laramie Plains Museum), Laramie, Albany County, Wyoming. Edward Ivinson, mayor of Laramie and unsuccessful candidate for governor of Wyoming in 1892, was a prosperous banker. His mansion was built in 1892 from plans by the Salt Lake City architect E. Waring. House and furniture cost $40,000, a considerable sum in 1892. The shower, which sprays inward from all pipes, was purchased in Chicago and was the most up-to-date plumbing equipment available. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1974. (LC HABS WYO, 1–LARAM, 2–22) relatively recently. The change in shower baths from the rather primitive contraption in the unspoiled mid-Victorian bathroom of the David Davis Mansion of 1872 in Bloomington, Illinois, to the complex gadget of 1892 in the Ivinson Mansion (Laramie Plains Museum) at Laramie, Wyoming, is well illustrated in two revealing photographs (figs. 15, 16). Other examples of past plumbing may be seen in the bathroom of the Welch-Ross House in Cambridge, Massachusetts. The kitchen of the General Dodge House, in Council Bluffs, Iowa, has a marble sink. The molded china commode set on a marble base in the James Whitcomb Riley House combines ornament with use (fig. 17).

Heating devices, both movable and fixed, are well represented in HABS photographs. Kitchen ranges, like the splendid example in the William A. Farnsworth Homestead in Rockland, Maine, are numerous and the subject of a separate study here by Rodris Roth.

Movable heating stoves are illustrated by examples such as the elegant Gothic parlor stove of 1851 in the Dr. Alfred Paige House built in Bethel, Vermont, in 1833 (fig. 18). The very fine parlor stove in the King House, photographed in 1932 in Virginia City, Nevada, and the stove dated 1883 by the Chicago Stove Works in St. Andrew's Episcopal Church in Atlantic City, Wyoming, are other examples of stoves not for cooking (figs. 19, 20). Steam or hot water radiators are stunningly represented by the grille-shielded example surmounted by an étagère in the dining room dating from 1864 at Lyndhurst at Tarrytown, New York, as well as less grandly but more typically by a late nineteenth-century cast-iron radiator in the Townsend House of 1835 in Windsor, Vermont (figs. 21, 22).

Because mantelpieces were almost invariably included among interior views, fireplaces of all periods are abundantly represented. An unusually attractive cast-iron fire frame was photographed in the Nettie Thompson House in Georgetown, Ohio (fig. 23). I was surprised to come upon a photograph of a cast-iron mantelpiece with églomisé glass spandrel panels in the Houseman Residence of 1850, demol-

Water was originally pumped from cisterns in the backyard to attic tanks. The bathroom fixtures are original. The water closet is china with a molded leaf pattern and is set on a marble slab within the carpeted floor. The seat and tank, which has a crystal chain pull, are cherry. The lavatory has an oval china basin, a marble top and backsplash set on a cherry cabinet with raised molded panels outlining a door, and a tier of three drawers. The taps are brass. The copper-lined bathtub is enclosed in tongue-and-groove cherry wainscoting, and the whole room has similar wainscoting below red wallpaper with a floral pattern. The ceiling paper is white. The red carpet has a pattern of yellow and blue. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1970. (LC HABS IND, 49–IND, 8–18)

Figure 18 Stove in the northeast bedroom on the second floor of the Dr. Alfred Paige House, Bethel, Windsor County, Vermont. The Dr. Alfred Paige House reflects the continuous ownership of one family through four generations. The house was built in 1833, but during the 1850s a notable cast-iron stove made in Troy, New York, and patented in 1851 replaced the fireplace in the northeast bedroom. Mark Twain, in the chapter titled "The House Beautiful" in his Life on the Mississippi referred to a "Polished air-tight stove (new and deadly invention), with pipe passing through a board which closes up the discarded good old fireplace." By 1883, when that was written, Mark Twain thought of fireplaces with nostalgia, but pragmatic Vermonters, coping with their winters, did not share his sentiment. This highly ornamental Gothic stove was probably designed for a parlor, not a bedroom. The urn finial is a water vase to humidify the atmosphere. The Paige House now has central heating as well as two first-floor soapstone fireplaces and another cast-iron stove in a plain, severe style made by R. and J. Wainwright of Middlebury, Vermont. That stove dates from the building of the house. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1959. (LC HABS VT, 14–BETH, 1–8)

ished in 1934 in Montgomery, Alabama, that proved to be identical with a pair of mantelpieces in my own former home, built in 1859 at 17 Clinton Street in Cambridge, Massachusetts (fig. 24). Among the great number of notable mantelpieces recorded, one that particularly struck my fancy was the grand example with a glass mosaic overmantel in the Magerstadt House of 1906–8, in Chicago (fig. 25).

Interior photographs taken by the Survey during the 1930s often yield unexpected information about the past. They reveal survivals such as the carpets in the King House in Virginia City, Nevada, or painted window shades like those in the Blakely Plantation near Vicksburg, Mississippi, and in Malmaison near Carrollton, Mississippi. Since the 1930s, such furnishings have altogether vanished or become exceedingly rare.

The early HABS photographs are invaluable, too, for establishing the original condition of subsequently restored properties. For example, Sturdivant Hall, a fine 1853 house in Selma, Alabama, has been supposedly improved by having its soft pine hall floor replaced by elaborate marble and its original gilded gas chandeliers replaced by crystal fixtures of an eighteenth-century type. The double parlors the crystal fixtures now illuminate have been painted anachronistic Wedgewood blue with white trim! It is most unfortunate that similarly mistreated Natchez, Mississippi, interiors were not photographed during the 1930s while they were still pristine.

Early HABS photographs frequently show lighting fixtures that had survived from the nineteenth century. The gas candles in the Decatur House hall in Washington, D.C., appear in a photograph that shows Victorian frescoes dating from around 1870 when the Beale family bought the house (fig. 26). The frescoes are now obliterated. Many restored houses, for example, the Richardson-Owens-Thomas House of 1816–19 in Savannah, Georgia, once had mid-nineteenth-century gas fixtures. The original condition of fixtures that were later electrified may also often be ascertained from photographs, as, for instance, in those of the Shrewsbury House in Madison, Indiana.

With increasing frequency, copies of nineteenth-century interior photographs are included in HABS records. These provide documentation of furnishings and fixtures that is not otherwise readily obtainable. Citing even a few of these will show their varied subject matter. Copies of photographs dating from 1869 show the interior of St. John's Episcopal Church in Washington, D.C., before James Renwick's enlargement in 1883 altered the east end. Photographs of Chicago's Rookery Building before Frank Lloyd Wright's alterations show the original main stairway (fig. 28). The original lighting fixtures and stenciled ornamentation of the United States Branch Mint in San Francisco are visible in early photographs, too (fig. 29). Old photographs of the now-demolished Valentine-Fuller House of 1848 in Cambridge, Massachusetts, show furniture purchased in 1865 as well as gas fixtures probably by Henry N. Hooper and Company (fig. 30). Photographs dating from the turn of the century of the James Whitcomb Riley House, built about 1866–72 in Indianapolis, show only minor differences from present conditions. This distinguishes the Riley house from house museums where modern canons of taste have been, however subconsciously, imposed (figs. 31, 32). Among the copied photographs, those showing the Stanford-Lathrop Memorial Home in Sacramento, California, as it was refurnished by the Leland Stanfords around 1872 are outstanding for the data they supply.

Let us now consider lighting fixtures, which started out to be the subject of my inquiry. Gas lighting got an early start in the United States with the establishment of a chartered gas company in Baltimore in 1817. By 1840 there were 11 gas companies in America, and by the end of 1850, 51 compa-

Its ornately scrolled design includes mica windows—colloquially called isinglass—in its door. Those windows restored some of the missing cheerfulness of the "discarded good old fireplace" by making the fire visible. The long stovepipe helped to radiate heat. Photograph by Robert W. Figure 20 Stove in St. Andrew's Episcopal Church, Atlantic City, Fremont County, Wyoming. Atlantic City was founded in 1868 to serve the South Pass mining district. The population soon rose to 2,000, but by 1870 it had dropped to 325. This Ajax Stove in the Episcopal church was made by the Chicago Stove Works in 1883. It is of the simplest possible kind and could be used for either heating or cooking. It may be assumed that in the boom-and-bust economy of the mining area St. Andrew's wardens and vestry were not willing to risk indebtedness for a fancier stove. This stove differs little in general appearance from plain box stoves of the 1830s. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1974. (LC HABS WYO, 7–ATCI, 5–4) nies had been chartered. By 1863, there were 433 gas companies in the United States and 23 in Canada. By 1876, every American community larger than a village had its own gas company, and many country estates in places too small to support a gas company had private gas plants.

After Edison established the first central power station, the Pearl Street Station in New York, in 1882, electric lighting made slow progress because the Welsbach burner, or gas mantle, first manufactured commercially in 1887, made incandescent gas lighting competitive with electric lighting. The older open-flame burners were rendered obsolete not only by electric bulbs but also by Welsbach's mantles, which permitted gas to retain its lead as an illuminant into the present century.

Except for those in a very few colonial churches, I found no eighteenth-century chandeliers in their original settings. Almost all had been installed during restorations or refurnishings. There were, however, a few fine early nineteenth-century fixtures recorded in situ, the most notable of which hung in the Greek Revival ballroom of the Croghan House, built about 1835 in Pittsburgh (fig. 33). It was later installed in the University of Pittsburgh's Cathedral of Learning. The splendid Empire chandelier was probably imported, not an American artifact. The prism-hung chandelier in the eighteenth-century west parlor of Belmont Hall in Smyrna, Delaware, however, is almost certainly American and appears to date from about 1835–45 (fig. 34). A similar example hangs in Andrew Jackson's back parlor at The Hermitage in Davidson County, Tennessee, and yet another, fitted for oil lamps instead of candles, in the William B. Sappington House near Arrow Rock, Missouri. A fine example with six gas burners hung in the now-vanished Nolting House in Richmond, Virginia. This type, with ormolu finish and tiers of diminishing rings of prisms surrounding the stem, went out of fashion before gas became very common.

In my quest for illustrations of lighting fixtures, I found that places of worship yielded the most information of any building type except dwellings. The large brass chandelier in St. Paul's Episcopal Church of 1707 in Wickford, Rhode Island, appears to be original, as does the fine pair in Trinity church, built in Newport in 1726. The splendid set of five chandeliers in the Touro Synagogue of 1763 in Newport, Rhode Island, are likewise original. The great glass chandelier, now discretely electrified, in the First Baptist Meeting House of 1775 in Providence, Rhode Island, is original and was formerly flanked by four eight-light gas chandeliers dating from around 1850. The grand glass chandelier in the United Church of 1815 in New Haven is also original and is not electrified. All of these chandeliers (except the First Baptist Meeting House gas fixtures) were imported.

Figure 21 Radiator in the dining room at Lyndhurst, Tarrytown, Westchester County, New York. Lyndhurst was designed by Alexander Jackson Davis for William Paulding and built in 1838. In 1864–65 Davis greatly enlarged the house for George Merritt, making Lyndhurst one of the grandest Gothic Revival houses in America. Steam heating had become fairly common in superior dwellings by 1865 when the new dining room at Lyndhurst was completed. The radiator is Gold's Patent Steam Heating Apparatus manufactured by Hills & Benton of Brooklyn, New York, and New Haven, Connecticut. The étagère surmounting the radiator is not part of the apparatus. A marble-topped ornamental cast-iron grille conceals the radiator itself. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1971. Figure 23 Mantelpiece in the Nettie Thompson House, Georgetown, Brown County, Ohio. The Nettie Thompson House was built in 1848 in the Greek Revival style. The cast-iron frame within the wooden mantelpiece displays Greek anthemion and palmette motifs. The hearth and fireboard, however, are thoroughly eclectic, combining Baroque and Rococo motifs with the figurine of an American Indian in high relief. The Neo-Classical frame itself is handsomely consistent in design. Photograph by E. F. Schrand and A. Hofmann, 1936. (LC HABS OHIO, 8–GEOTO. V, 1–6)

Figure 24 Housman residence, Montgomery, Montgomery County, Alabama. The Housman residence was built in 1850. Cast-iron mantelpieces with églomisé glass spandrels were quite popular during the 1850s. Identical examples of this design, patented by Hiram Tucker of Cambridge, Mass., on April 2, 1850, existed in the Woolley House in Lexington, Kentucky, as well as in the 1859 house at 17 Clinton Street in Cambridge, Massachusetts. There is a more elaborate Neo-Rococo example, probably by the James L. Jackson Foundry in New York City, in the Benjamin Titcomb-Harriet Beecher Stowe House in Brunswick, Maine. The latter house was extensively remodeled during the 1850s. Photograph by W. N. Manning, 1934. (LC HABS ALA, 51–MONG, 15–3)

Figure 25 Entrance hall mantel in the Ernest J. Magerstadt House, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. The Magerstadt House was completed in 1908 from plans by George W. Maher. It is an outstanding example of that architect's work and was designated a Chicago Architectural Landmark in 1960. The mantelpiece in the entrance hall, with its glass mosaic panel, is one of the most beautiful features of the distinguished Art Nouveau interior. Photograph by Cervin Robinson, 1963. Figure 26 Entrance hall, Decatur House, Washington, D.C. The house designed in 1818 by Benjamin Henry Latrobe for Stephen Decatur in Washington is a distinguished town house of the federal period. In 1870 the house was acquired by Gen. Edward Beale, who modernized it by adding mid-Victorian decorative elements. Many of the Beale period interior embellishments were obliterated after 1960 by the National Trust for Historic Preservation to which Mrs. Truxton Beale left the property. Photograph by John O. Brostrup, 1937. (LC HABS DC, WASH, 28–14)

Figure 27 Rookery Building lobby, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. The Rookery Building was erected in 1886–88 from plans by Burnham and Root. A copy of an 1893 photograph shows the lobby in its original state with much ornamental cast-iron work before Frank Lloyd Wright's alterations of 1905. "In every detail of The Rookery the subtlety of Root's creative imagination is apparent, but nowhere is his genius more obvious than in the glass-and-iron vault over the court. It is the finest example of its kind in the United States." So stated Carl W. Condit in American Building Art: The Nineteenth Century (New York: Oxford University Press, 1960), p. 55. Figure 29 Engine room, U.S. Branch Mint, San Francisco, San Francisco County, California. The U.S. Branch Mint in San Francisco was designed by Alfred Bult Mullett and built in 1869–74. It was so well constructed that it survived the 1906 San Francisco earthquake and fire. It served as the central depot for all the gold and silver produced in the Pacific Coast area until it ceased functioning as a mint in 1937. The room containing the majestic steam engine was handsomely fitted up with a tessellated marble floor and fine bronze gas chandeliers. The engine housing was supported by Tuscan columns on paneled plinths—a blending of Roman classicism with nineteenth-century engineering. Copy of a Runnels & Stateler photograph taken about 1882–85. Figure 28 (opposite) Rookery Building main lobby in 1963, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. The court lobby of the Rookery Building was remodeled by Frank Lloyd Wright in 1905. Wright removed most of John Wellborn Root's original iron ornament and replaced it with simple geometric designs. The staircase was enclosed in white marble. Rectangular marble urns and rectangular light fixtures were also designed by Wright. Elaborate gilded arabesques ornament many of the remodeled surfaces. Additional changes were made in 1944 from plans by Magnus Gunderson. Photograph by Cervin Robinson, 1963. (LC HABS ILL, 16–CHIG, 31–7)

Figure 30 Drawing room, Valentine-Fuller House, Cambridge, Middlesex County, Massachusetts. The Valentine-Fuller House with attached carriage house and stable was erected in 1848. House and grounds together made a particularly fine intact example of a mid-nineteenth-century suburban estate. It was demolished in 1937. When Robert O. Fuller bought the property from Charles Valentine in 1865, Fuller ordered the drawing room furniture. The draperies dated from 1865, but the Oriental rug was added atop the carpet during the 1880s. The two gas chandeliers in this large room appear to have been by the Boston firm of Henry N. Hooper. The plaster work and door trim are Greek Revival, but the exterior of the house was Italianate with very wide bracketed eaves. Copy of an 1890 photograph. (LC HABS MASS, 9–CAMB, 10–8)

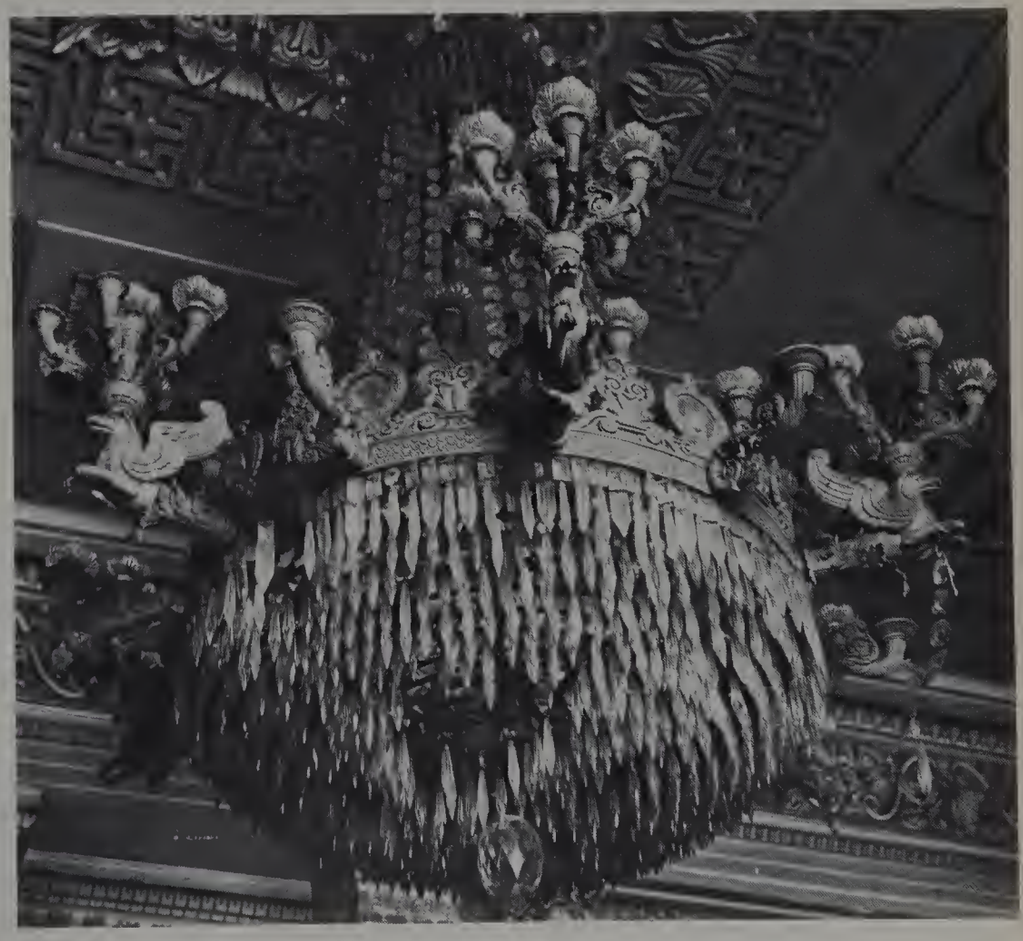

Figure 31 (opposite) Dining room of the James Whitcomb Riley House, Indianapolis, Marion County, Indiana, around 1900. Comparison of the picture taken around 1900 with a photograph taken in 1970 shows almost no change in the Riley House dining room (see fig. 32). The same furniture and carpet are there, and even the shades of the gas chandelier and the smoke bells above them have survived intact. Only the upholstery of the chairs and the wallpaper have been replaced. The carpet is dark red with a light red arabesque design. The embossed paper wainscot is dark brown. The built-in cherry buffet in the framed recess of the south wall has a white marble top. The fireplace on the opposite wall has a round-arched brown-veined Vermont marble mantelpiece surmounted by a cherry framed mirror. Other interiors of the James Whitcomb Riley House are shown in figs. 17, 51, 52. (LC HABS IND, 49–IND, 8–12)

Figure 34 West parlor of Belmont Hall, Smyrna, Kent County, Delaware. Belmont Hall was built in 1753 and enlarged in 1771. It was extensively rebuilt after fire damage in 1882. The west parlor dates from 1771, but the chandelier is at least sixty years later in date. Tiered prism-hung chandeliers of this general pattern were common in America from around 1830 until about 1850 or later. Some held candles; others held oil lamps; and still others were piped for gas. Photograph by Cortlandt VanDyke Hubbard, 1960. (LC HABS DEL, 1–SMYR V, 3–10)

Figure 36 (opposite) Chandelier in First Parish Church (Unitarian), Kennebunk, York County, Maine. The First Parish Church was commenced in 1772, enlarged in 1803, and subdivided horizontally in 1838. Brass ormolu chandeliers with ornamental chains were very popular in America during the 1840s and early 1850s. The Neo-Rococo arms and grape-patterned chains are typical. Many chandeliers of this style were made for gas. This one supports six oil lamps. The shades of these lamps date from after 1880, and the lamps themselves appear to be replacements of earlier ones. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1965.

Figure 35 Interior of the Dutch Reformed Church, Millstone, Somerset County, New Jersey. This church was built in 1828. The large Neo-Grec three-tiered chandelier supports a total of eighteen oil lamps and dates from the late 1860s or the 1870s. There are also three-lamp wall brackets en suite with the chandelier. The Neo-Grec style had reached its apogee in America by the centennial year, 1876. The stamped metal sheathing of the walls and ceiling appears to date from around the turn of the century. Figure 37 Main staircase of the General Grenville M. Dodge House, Council Bluffs, Pottawattamie County, Iowa. In 1866 Gen. Grenville Mellen Dodge was made chief engineer of the Union Pacific Railroad. In 1869–70 he built his brick mansard-roofed house, modifying plans by the Chicago architect William W. Boyington. The fourteen-room mansion cost $35,000, a considerable sum for the time. The gas standard on the newel post of the main staircase is ornamented with polychromed ceramic elements in the Anglo-Japanese style. The gas fitting for the house was done by an Omaha firm. The house is now subdivided into apartments. Anonymous photograph, after 1916. (LC HABS IOWA, 78–COUB, 1–4)

Figure 38 Main stairs, Morse-Libby House, Portland, Cumberland County, Maine. The Morse-Libby House was built in 1859–63 from plans by the New Haven architect Henry Austin. The first owner, Ruggles Sylvester Morse, was a hotel entrepreneur. The interiors of this towered Italianate villa were sumptuously ornamented by Giuseppe Guidicini—now often miscalled Giovanni Guidirini—a New York artist. The most elaborate form of gas standard was the bronze statue. Here a pair of them both ornaments and illuminates the newel posts of the flying staircase in the Morse-Libby House hall. The house is now known as Victoria Mansion—a museum. See fig. 47 for another interior view of this splendid dwelling. Anonymous photograph, 1936. (LC HABS ME, 3–PORT, 15–3)

Figure 39 Second floor drawing room mirror, Emerson and Holmes Building, Macon, Bibb County, Georgia. The Emerson and Holmes Building was built in 1854 as an unusually fine set of dentist's offices for a Dr. Emerson from New Hampshire. The third floor contained living quarters. The two-tiered ten-light gas chandelier still had most of its original globes when a HABS photographer caught its reflection. The building was still used for dental offices in 1936. Photograph by L. D. Andrew, 1936. (LC HABS GA, 11–MACO, 13–4) chandeliers fitted for oil lamps existed in churches when HABS photographs were taken during the 1930s. Among the excellent examples are the two-tiered chandelier in the Presbyterian Church at Pisgah, Kentucky, and that in the Zion church near Columbia, Tennessee. The latter blends Eastlake and Néo-Grec details in an eclectic mélange. An even grander post-Civil-War oil chandelier is the three-tiered example that a HABS photographer found hanging in the Dutch Reformed Church in Millstone, New Jersey (fig. 35). Among later recordings, two of the handsomest church chandeliers are the examples from about 1845–50, each with eight lamps (now electrified), in the First Parish Church, Unitarian, in Kennebunk, Maine. Four matching four-light gas chandeliers, similar in style to the Kennebunk examples, are suspended by brackets from the side galleries of the Beneficent Congregational Church in Providence, Rhode Island. Small gas chandeliers suspended from the wall by brackets were called toilets, as they were intended to hang beside dressing tables to illuminate their looking glasses. A very fine six-light gas chandelier, now fitted with electric candles instead of glass-shaded bulbs, is in the Oliver Hazard Perry house, built about 1845 in Southport, Connecticut. It belongs to the same Neo-Rococo type with ornamental chains as the Kennebunk and Providence examples. By the mid-1850s, the chains common to such chandeliers were considered passé.

The only examples found in the Survey of reflector chandeliers, a type once widely used after the Civil War in places of public assembly, were those in churches. In the Methodist Church in Forkland, Alabama, and in the Figure 40 Province Street steps, Boston, Suffolk County, Massachusetts. The Greek Revival palmette motifs in the wrought-iron archway supporting this gas street lantern suggest a date in the 1830s. The steps connect Bosworth Street, which runs a short block from Tremont Street, with a formerly narrow lane called Province Street. Gas street lighting first came to Boston in the 1820s. Figure 41 Lamp post in front of Christ Episcopal Church, Mobile, Mobile County, Alabama. This cast-iron lamp post probably dates from around 1855, when the City of Mobile received numerous requests for the placement of posts on designated corners. The crossbar served to support the lamplighter's ladder. The post is a standard design, but the lantern shielding the gas light is more ornamental than most. Possibly the lantern was provided by the wardens and vestry of Christ Church, not by the city. Photograph by E. W. Russell, 1937. (LC HABS ALA, 49–MOBI, 33C–2)

Figure 42 Detail of columns, Reid-Jones-Carpenter House, Augusta, Richmond County, Georgia. The Corinthian portico of the Greek Revival Reid-Jones-Carpenter House is lighted by at least one gas bracket affixed to the inner face of a fluted column. This unusual arrangement is made even more uncommon by the form of the bracket, which was certainly designed for interior use. Exterior gas lights require more protection from wind than that provided by the open glass shade of this bracket in the form of an angel. Photograph by Lawrence Bradley, 1936. (HABS GA–227, LC HABS GA, 122–AUG, 13–3)

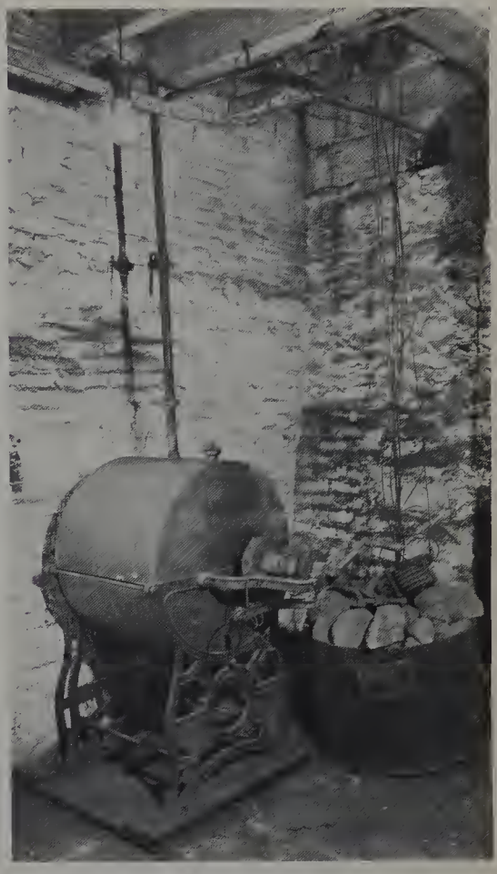

Figure 43 Gas machine in the cellar of the Isaac Kinsey House, Milton vicinity, Wayne County, Indiana. Beechwood, the Isaac Kinsey House, was built during 1871–73 from plans by the Richmond, Indiana, architect Joel Stover. This rare private gas machine had a small furnace for the distillation of gas from coal. Counterweights attached to the drum had to be cranked upward to effect a constant pressure of gas to as many as thirty burners throughout the house. See fig. 44 for another gas machine. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1975. (LC HABS IND, 1–MILT V, 1–19)

Figure 44 Advertisement for a Springfield Gas Machine around 1868. The Springfield Gas Machine generated gas from gasoline in an evaporating tank placed underground at a distance from the building to be lighted. An air pump driven by a weight suspended from the cellar ceiling forced air through a pipe leading to the generating tank, and a second pipe conveyed the gas from the tank to the house. The extraordinary mansion in this advertisement appears to contain only parlors. Engraving by John Keim, published by Hay Brothers. (LC–USZ62–44118)

Congregational Church in Rocky Hill, Connecticut, hung typical examples. The Congregational Church chandelier was photographed from above. Reflector fixtures used mirror-lined shades to throw light down where it was needed. The Oahe Congregational Mission in Pierre, South Dakota, had a three-light oil chandelier in which the turn-of-the-century lamps were designed on a new principle to project their light downward.

Gas standards—that is, fixtures rising from the floor or a flat raised surface to support one or more burners—appear in photographs of church interiors more frequently than elsewhere. The St. Thomas Reformed Church of 1846 at Charlotte Amalie in the Virgin Islands was lighted by gas standards on the pew ends. The First Parish Church in Castleton, Vermont, has a pair of two-light pulpit standards now electrified. And Trinity Church in Southport, Connecticut, contains a striking pair of brass chancel candelabra similar to those designed for gas. The Alexander House, a dwelling of the Federal period located in Springfield, Massachusetts, has an extremely rare pair of gas mantelpiece standards. Most standards in private houses appear on newel posts. The newel post standard in the General Dodge House in Council Bluffs, Iowa, is an example in the Anglo-Japanese taste. A splendid pair of bronze figurines, each supporting a gas light, stand atop the carved Santo Domingo mahogany newel posts of the flying staircase in the Morse-Libby House of 1859–63 in Portland, Maine (figs. 37, 38).

Until 1959, only one gas fixture was itself specifically photographed by the Survey. The rest appear only incidentally with ceiling centerpieces or in general interior views. Thus, the battered and bent three-light gaselier of the 1850s, captioned "Typical Original Gas-Fired Chandelier," photographed on March 10, 1934, in the weedy yard of the James Vance House in San Antonio, Texas, by Marvin Eickenroht is unique among the early HABS photographs. An August 2, 1936, photograph captioned "Mirror in Drawing Room Second Floor," which shows the reflection of a fine two-tiered gaselier with original shades in the Emerson and Holmes Building, dental offices of 1854 in Macon, Georgia, typifies the prevailing myopia of the 1930s toward gas fixtures (fig. 39). Photographer Jack E. Boucher's picture of the very large Gothic gaselier in the 1857 National Guard's Hall in Philadelphia, taken in April 1959, is among the earliest photographs expressly intended to show chandeliers and marks a change of emphasis in recording.

There are relatively few exterior gaslights represented in the Survey. Certainly the gas lantern supported by a wrought-iron archway over the

Figure 45 Gas chandelier in the southeast room of the Charles Dana House, Woodstock, Windsor County, Vermont. The Charles Dana House, now a historical society museum, was built in 1807. This fanciful gas chandelier was probably installed in 1856, when gas came to Woodstock, or shortly thereafter. Its style is typical of the late 1850s. If it had been electrified to take smaller bulbs, the effect would have been better. The shades are original. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1959. (LC HABS VT, 14–WOOD, 6–10)

Figure 46 Gas chandelier in the northeast room of the Hardaway-Wilson House, Mobile, Mobile County, Alabama. Georgia Cottage, the Hardaway-Wilson House, was built in 1840. Electricity was installed by the present owner in 1935. The house had never been piped for gas, and this chandelier is not original to the house. It was acquired locally from a demolished property and is typical of the 1850s in its Neo-Rococo design. The shades date from around 1890–1900. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1963. (LC HABS ALA, 49–MOBI, 133–7)

Figure 47 Music room in the Morse-Libby House, Portland, Cumberland County, Maine. The gilt bronze gas chandeliers in the Morse-Libby House of 1859–63 are exceptionally fine. Most, including the music room chandelier, retain their original shades. The shades on the gas brackets flanking the mantel mirror are later. Wide-based shades came in after 1876 and were common by 1880. They allowed a greater flow of air to the flame and thus greatly reduced flickering.

This view of the music room shows the original carpet as well as the lavishly carved white marble mantelpiece with dancing figures, the rich plaster cornice, and some of Giuseppe Guidicini's decorative painting. See fig. 38 for another interior of this magnificent mansion. Anonymous photograph, 1936. (LC HABS ME, 3–PORT, 15–7)

Figure 48 Northwest double parlor in the Stanford-Lathrop Memorial Home, Sacramento, Sacramento County, California. The Stanford-Lathrop Memorial Home was built in 1857–58 from plans by Seth Babson (1828–1907), a Sacramento architect who was born in Maine. In 1861 the original owner, Shelton C. Fogus, sold the property to Governor Leland Stanford. In 1871–72 Stanford vastly enlarged the house. The Stanfords moved to San Francisco in 1874, and in 1900 Stanford's widow gave the house to the Roman Catholic Bishop of Sacramento for an orphanage. The double parlor is part of the original, 1857–58 structure. Its contents date from 1872. The carpet is sewn together from unusually wide strips. Most carpet strips were only twenty-seven inches wide. The gas chandeliers may possibly date from 1857–58. See also figure 49. From a copy of a photograph taken around 1872. (HABS CAL, 34–SAC, 9–10)

Figure 49 West parlor and dining room in the Stanford-Lathrop Memorial Home, Sacramento, Sacramento County, California. These rooms are in the newer portion of the house dating from 1871–72. The San Francisco Chronicle for February 7, 1872, reported that the house contained "forty-four rooms, all most elaborately and luxuriously furnished and fitted up. Good taste and cultured imagination have been exhausted in furnishing the establishment. Magnificent and costly furniture in every room; lace curtains of the finest fabric; carpets that receive with noiseless tread the footfall." The Neo-Renaissance bronze stands with putti supporting lidded urns may well have exhausted "cultured imagination." The table in the foreground was certainly "magnificent and costly." The sculpture in the niche and the circular photographs of Bertel Thorvaldsen's once-famous bas reliefs Day and Night certified the culture of their owner. Geometric medallion-patterned carpets like those seen here were popular in the 1860s and early 1870s. These both silenced footfalls and visually dominated the rooms. The chandelier with the patent center slide was made by the New York firm of Mitchell, Vance and Company. The brass crowns on the shades were an extra luxury. This house is now run by the Sisters of Social Service as a home for girls and is open by request. Many Stanford pieces are still in place. From a copy of a photograph taken around 1872. (LC HABS CAL, 34–SAC, 9–12)

Figure 50 Chandelier in the J. Stuart Wells House, Binghamton, Broome County, New York. J. Stuart Wells was the leading building contractor of Binghamton. His nineteen-room house was built in 1867–70 from plans by Isaac G. Perry. The Neo-Grec plaster centerpiece above this four-light bronze gas chandelier accords well with the same stylistic expression in the fixture itself. Griffins like those perched at the springing of the branches were a favorite motif on Neo-Grec chandeliers. The style flourished in America from around 1865 until the late 1870s. The shades on this fixture date from the 1880s. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1966. (LC HABS NY, 4–BING, 6–7)

Figure 51 Riley's bedroom in the James Whitcomb Riley House, Indianapolis, Marion County, Indiana. The James Whitcomb Riley House was completed by 1872 for John R. Nickum. Nickum died in 1902. Riley resided in the house from 1893 until his death in 1916 as a paying guest of Nickum and his heirs. The house is now a museum operated by the James Whitcomb Riley Memorial Association.

Riley's bedroom has a tan carpet with a multicolored geometric pattern. The wallpaper has white "snowflake geometric" designs on a light brown ground. The frieze above the picture molding has gilded swags on a tan ground. The ceiling is tan. The mantelpiece is a dark Vermont marble. The massive walnut bedstead and marble-topped bureau date from the 1850s or early 1860s. Glass bells suspended over the gas chandelier protect the ceiling from smoke. See also figs. 17, 31, 32, 52. From a copy of a photograph taken around 1900. (LC HABS IND, 49–IND, 8–14)

Province Street steps in Boston is one of the most memorable examples (fig. 40). Somewhat more typical is a gas lantern bracketed out from a wall in the courtyard of the Cabildo in New Orleans. Several standard street lamps were recorded, one standing in front of Christ Episcopal Church in Mobile among the most handsome (fig. 41). A greatly enlarged version of this type, the Harbor Beacon in Savannah, Georgia, is certainly a splendid extant example. The gas bracket on the inner face of a portico column at the Reid-Jones-Carpenter House of 1849 in Augusta, Georgia, is a great rarity (fig. 42). It may have produced an effect similar to that admired at the Second Bank of the United States in Philadelphia on February 14, 1838, by the diarist Philip Hone, who wrote: "The portico . . . appeared more beautiful . . . than usual, from the effect of the gaslight. Each of the fluted columns had a jet of light from the inner side so placed as not to be seen from the street . . . which . . .produced an effect strikingly beautiful."

By 1873, when the Isaac Kinsey House was completed near Milton, Indiana, city and town gas was widely available, but village and country houses had to rely on private gas machines. The only gas machine recorded in the Survey is the exceedingly rare example in the Kinsey House cellar (fig. 43). Its undated label reads: "30 light combination/ gas machine/ manufactured by/ Detroit Heating & Lighting Co/ Detroit Mich."

Domestic gas lighting is well represented in the Survey. Examples range from the simple to the elaborate and from early to late. The gaselier with rope and tassel motif in the southwest room of the 1807 Charles Dana House

Figure 52 Gas fixture in Holstein's bedroom in the James Whitcomb Riley House, Indianapolis, Marion County, Indiana. John R. Nickum's son-in-law, Charles L. Holstein, was a U.S. district attorney. Until his death in 1901 he occupied the southeast corner bed-sitting room in the house. The chandelier in that room was originally all gas-lighted. The electrical elements were added early in the present century. Although James Whitcomb Riley never owned the house that now bears his name, his fame as a popular poet and journalist has eclipsed the memory of the Nickum and Holstein families who were his hosts. The James Kirksey House was prefabricated in New England, shipped to St. Marks via New Orleans, hauled to Tallahassee by ox teams, and erected in 1830–32. The house is said to have been equipped with gas lighting before 1860. The open flame batswing or fishtail burners at the left are original to this chandelier. The inverted burners at the right are designed for Welsbach mantles and were added after 1905. The design of the chandelier bears out a putative date of around 1860. Photograph by Jack E. Originally built in 1801, the Jefferson County Courthouse was partially destroyed during the Civil War and restored and enlarged around 1867. The main courtroom is on the second floor, which was added at that time. The extraordinary chandelier in the form of a corona dates from around 1900 and combines over fifty gas candles with a like number of white-shaded electric bulbs. Photograph by Edward M. Craig, 1936. Figure 55 Basement women's lounge in the Paramount Theatre, Oakland, Alameda County, California. The Paramount Theatre was built in 1930–31 from plans by Timothy L. Pflueger. It is one of the finest remaining examples of Art Deco design in the United States. It was one of the first depression-era buildings to incorporate and integrate the work of numerous creative artists into its architecture and is particularly noteworthy for its successful orchestration of the various artistic disciplines into an original and harmonious whole. The corners of this women's lounge contain floor-to-ceiling concave quarter-round amber-back-lit etched glass panels, creating an unusual spatial effect. A large silvered plaster bas-relief, representing a female nude blowing a slender horn and sitting precariously on a goat prancing over a stylized cloud and shooting star, is centered on the east wall opposite the entrance. A recessed shallow silvered dome occupies the center of the ceiling and contains a very large-scaled plaster centerpiece of stylized foliation from which depends a two-tiered frosted glass lobe-edged light fixture accented by radiating metal spokes. The theater was restored in 1973 and is now a National Historic Landmark. Photograph by Gabriel Moulin Studios, 1932. (LC HABS CAL, 1–OAK, 9–25) in Woodstock, Vermont, dates from the 1850s and is an unusually fanciful example of a basically simple type (fig. 45). The relatively large Neo-Rococo gaselier in the northeast room of the Hardaway-Wilson House of 1840 in Mobile is also typical of the 1850s, but the shades are about forty years later in date (fig. 46). Similarly elaborate fixtures of the 1850s survived in the Elk's Club in Montgomery, Alabama. The Wickham-Valentine House in Richmond, Virginia, has superb examples in the parlor and hall (fig. 1). Gas fixtures of the 1860s are splendidly represented in the Governor Henry Lippitt House in Providence, Rhode Island, and by equally lavish and generally more graceful examples in the Morse-Libby House in Portland, Maine (fig. 47).

Glass gas chandeliers normally hung in parlors, but almost never in dining rooms. A particularly fine example of this "crystal" type with cut glass shades hangs in the Wayne-Gordon House in Savannah, Georgia. The double parlor of the Stanford-Lathrop Memorial Home of 1857 in Sacramento, California, had a handsome pair of six-light crystal fixtures that apparently dated from a remodeling finished in 1872 (fig. 48). The west parlor had a center-slide chandelier, whose central Argand burner could be lowered, executed by Mitchell, Vance and Company of New York (fig. 49). Such fixtures were used principally over library and dining room tables. The Néo-Grec chandelier in the first-floor southeast room of the J. Stuart Wells House of 1870 in Binghamton, New York, is highly characteristic of a style that flourished from around 1865 until the late 1870s (fig. 50).

The use of glass and porcelain smoke bells suspended above gas jets was primarily confined to hall fixtures (called pendants) like that in the James B. Weeks House in Kingston, New York. Occasionally smoke bells were used with chandeliers like the example with original shades dating from the 1850s in the Dearing House in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. The James Whitcomb Riley House in Indianapolis has smoke bells above the chandeliers in the dining room and in Riley's bedroom (fig. 51). The Riley House remains as it was when six electric lights were added to the original Eastlake gas fixture in Charles L. Holstein's bedroom (fig. 52).

The gradual progress electric light made against gas was slowed by the incandescent Welsbach burner which was first advertised in 1890. In 1905 an inverted Welsbach burner was introduced. Both the old and new types of gas burner are present in a partially converted chandelier in the James Kirksey House in Tallahassee, Florida (fig. 53). Before 1900, combination gas and electric fixtures became fairly common, and so-called gas candles were then a favored form of burner. The extraordinary corona in the Court House in Charles Town, West Virginia, combines gas candles with electric lights and thus heralds the approaching end of the gaslight era (fig. 54).

Artistically significant lighting fixtures by no means vanished with the conclusion of the gaslight era. Unquestionably some of the most striking lighting effects of this century were achieved in the Art Deco Paramount Theatre built in 1930–31 in Oakland, California. There the potentialities of indirect lighting were ingeniously exploited throughout the theater. The women's lounge in the basement has a particularly handsome ceiling fixture of frosted glass (fig. 55). Such lighting devices and all other important architectural details continue to be documented by the Historic American Buildings Survey.

America's Cast-Iron Heritage

by

MARGOT GAYLE

Cast iron was a gift of the eighteenth century to the nineteenth, and one of vast potential. The expansion of the world's modern cities was aided by it, as were the development of land and sea transportation and the creation of new systems of manufacture and production on an unprecedented scale. Cast iron also made beautiful architecture and landscape decoration democratically available at modest prices. It was strong, durable, and easily handled. As the nineteenth century opened, the age enjoyed a heritage made possible by this gift of eighteenth-century technology and invention. In the same sense, steel may be said to have been the gift of the nineteenth century to the twentieth.

Cast iron is a high carbon alloy, steel a low carbon alloy, and wrought iron an alloy with so little carbon that it is very close to pure iron. Other materials may also be included in these alloys by nature or added by man, but the carbon content is crucial. Each of these iron alloys has markedly different characteristics.

The alloy cast iron can be melted and then cast with the aid of patterns and cores, or by lost wax methods, into almost any shape that man can devise. It will hold that shape forever unless remelted. It has tremendous strength in compression but virtually no elasticity, and hence it is brittle and has little tensile strength. Wrought iron cannot be cast but it can be forged, hammered, and rolled. Steel unites the properties of strength in compression and in tension. It can be rolled, extruded, and cast, although the last presents difficulties.

In 1747 Abraham Darby of Shropshire, England, separated iron from its ore by substituting coke for scarce and costly charcoal, and when he was able to substitute coal for coke a few years later the future availability of cast iron was assured. There was no shortage of raw material, for iron is estimated to constitute one-twentieth of the earth's surface. After 1750 cast iron was no longer scarce, while wrought iron could be produced only with considerable labor and experience in small quantities by the process known as "puddling" and steel remained a distant dream. Darby's celebrated breakthrough became a principal factor in making the Industrial Revolution possible.

In England early railroad rails and steam boilers were cast iron. As sail gave way to steam, powerful engines required large-scale cast-iron components, which in the United States were produced in foundries along the east coast by sand casting in deep pits. Operations like the

Figure 1 Color lithograph by Sarony, Major & Knapp, the frontispiece in Illustrations of Iron Architecture (New York: Baker & Godwin, 1865), the catalog of Daniel D. Badger's Architectural Iron Works of New York. Only five copies of this beautifully illustrated publication are known, including one in the Library of Congress Prints and Photographs Division. None of its illustrations better show the full range of activities than this wonderfully imaginative, evocative pastiche of the factory in action. It reveals a beehive of activity, the artist having concentrated on the galleries, the foundry floor, and the basement beneath it, depicting in one scene the numerous processes that took place in various portions of what was actually a sprawling foundry. On the top balconies are typical post-and-lintel assemblies, probably representing shop-fitting of raw parts. One post is being raised to the right balcony on a gin pole and tackle, and a similar operation is seen on the middle balcony at the left, where a large lathe is in action and a drilling machine is being diligently cranked. The pattern shop occupies the middle right balcony. At the back, a patternmaker at his bench is engaged in hand work, which most patternmaking at that time involved. The big lathes are for wood turning, most of the balance of the work on patterns. The lathe in the foreground has elaborate gears propelled by a flat drive belt. In the background a workman uses a hammer, and other hammers are raised throughout the foundry. Eight chimneys belch smoke above the roof.

In the foreground architects are discussing their working drawings with foundry representatives and clients. In this happiest of all foundries, there are ladies in Victorian garb participating, looking over plans or strolling down the stairs, one with a parasol, tranquil amid all the hammering, grinding, assembling, and transporting of iron pieces.

On the basement level, a foundry with two cupola furnaces is seen in the space on the left. A stiff-leg crane is maneuvering the ladle of molten metal and pouring it into a flask containing a sand mold. Another part of a mold, the "drag," lies open on the floor. The horse and cart appear to be taking out a load of sand much used and ready to be discarded. Behind them, a workbench supports a large shear for cutting small bar stock or wire, basic to fence production. To the right, wrought iron is being produced by the puddling process in three reverberatory furnaces. Two workmen strike blows to a wrought iron part which a third man holds in position on the anvil. Although the company's stock in trade was cast-iron elements, wrought iron was produced for special structural uses, such as in bridges or girders reinforced with tension rods. (LC–USZ62–80408)

Novelty Iron Works on the banks of Manhattan's East River became well known to the maritime trade.

Cast iron proved a boon to the growing young nation, and the small ironworks which were set up throughout colonial America rapidly expanded after the Revolution removed the manufacturing restrictions of the mother country. The Historic American Buildings Survey has recorded cold blast charcoal furnaces like those in use in colonial times (fig. 2), and its sister agency, the Historic American Engineering Record, has documented later examples (fig. 3).

The ancient sand-casting process for creating objects large and small from molten lead, brass, bronze, and iron continued its usefulness for cast-iron architectural and industrial elements. Occasionally the lost wax process for casting metals has been used to produce small precision components, usually for machinery, although we think of it most often in connection with making fine bronzes or jewelry.

In primitive sand casting, a bed of damp sand on the foundry floor received the imprint of a form or pattern that was pressed into it. Ornamental touches were easily added by also pressing a length of rope, a bit of lettering, a coat of arms or a trademark, or some other appropriate design into the molded sand. Molten metal was poured into the resulting impressions in the sand and on cooling retained the shape of the temporary mold, at which time the sand could be brushed away to be used again. This method has enjoyed a variety of uses, whether for medieval iron graveslabs and firebacks or flat plate stoves and modern manhole covers. From Louisiana firebacks (fig. 4) to kitchen stoves (Roth, fig. 17) and Philadelphia sidewalks (fig. 5), HABS has recorded a variety of examples of sand-cast ironwork.

More useful and capable of producing more sophisticated castings is the flask system, wherein the damp refractory sand is packed into a two-part box called a "flask." A pattern—usually carved of pine or mahogany and shaped like the casting that will be the end result—is embedded in the center of the flask, and sand is rammed around it. After the "cope" or top half of the flask has been lifted to allow the pattern to be withdrawn, leaving a perfect impression, it is replaced and molten metal is poured into the cavity through small channels poked in the sand. This system makes possible a casting with a front and a back of different designs, like those found in the exterior railing of the Dakota Apartments or in the gallery railing of the U.S. Sub-Treasury Building in New York City, in a Brooklyn row house, on the stoop of a house in Schenectady, or on the veranda of the rectory of St. John's Church in Troy, New York (figs. 6, 7).

We have seen that cast iron can be shaped into many forms, either plain and utilitarian or complex and ornamental. Perhaps the most familiar use of cast iron, combining its decorative and structural properties, has been in the porticoes, porches, and verandas of the type seen in the Albany rectory but more characteristic of the American South. The Col. Robert Henry Short House in New Orleans provides a handsome example of two common residential uses of cast iron (fig. 8). Its two-story portico and cornstalk fence have cast filigreed shadows on house and lawn since 1859. Architect William Strickland made extensive interior use of similar cast-iron elements in his Tennessee Capitol, most conspicuously in its library, where the balconies, bookcases, lamp standards, and even the ceiling panels are of iron (fig. 9). In 1851 Thomas Ustick Walter used the material almost exclusively to render the Library of Congress room in the Capitol fireproof (Peatross, fig. 5), ordering his castings from the Janes, Beebe Ironworks in the Bronx, New York. The same ironworks was soon thereafter to supply the iron plates for the Capitol dome under the name of Janes, Kirtland & Co. Cast iron remained a popular material for library construction during the next half century and was used extensively for the bookstacks of the new Library of Congress building, finished in 1897, and Georgetown University's Riggs Memorial Library (fig. 10), completed in 1889, both works of the architectural firm of Smithmeyer & Pelz.

It was for exterior use, however, that cast iron proved most popular. The economy, durability, and malleability of iron recommended its widespread use in ornamental enclosures for parks, pleasure grounds, yards, and, not infrequently, cemeteries. If ever a metal was appropriate to the spirit of a period it was cast iron—with its endless capacity for ornament—in the

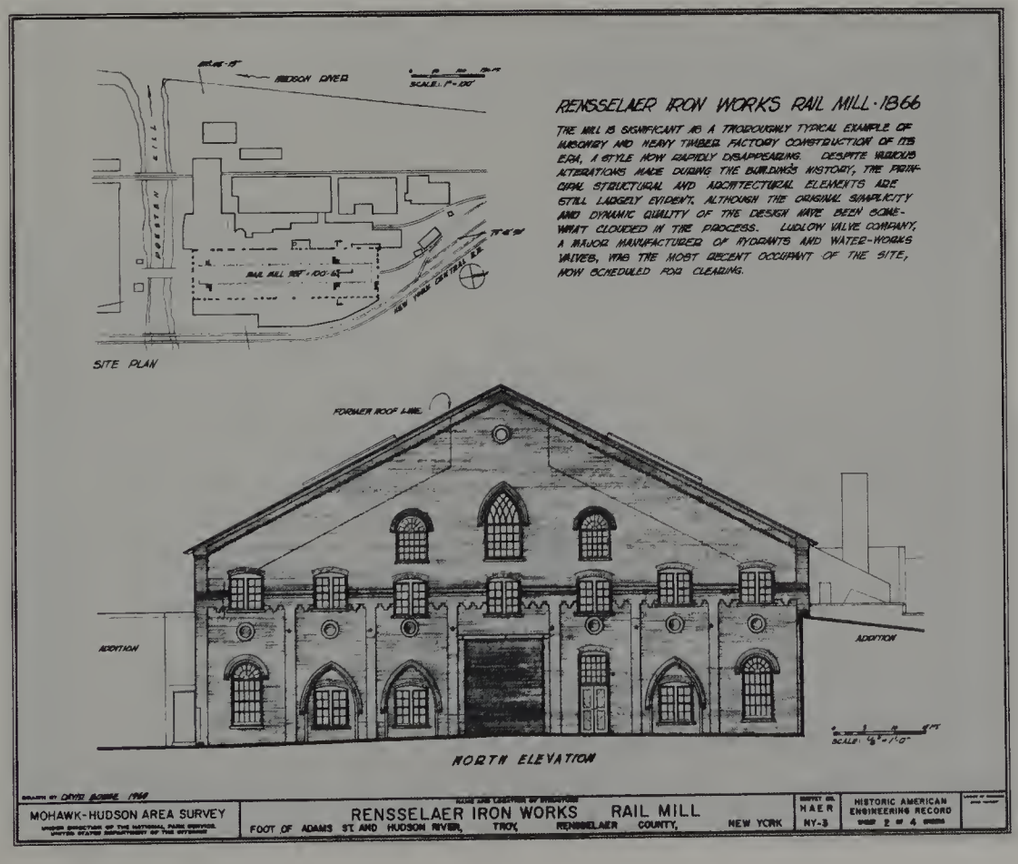

Figure 3 Rennselaer Iron Works rail mill, site plan, and north elevation by David Bouse, 1969. HAER's survey of New York's Mohawk-Hudson area recorded many notable nineteenth-century industrial structures, including this rail mill, recorded shortly before its demolition. Other iron foundries represented in the HAER collection are the famous Tredegar Works in Richmond, Virginia, and the Columbus Works in Columbus, Georgia, both of which served as major arsenals of the Confederacy. Figure 4 Flatbed sand-cast fireback panels are evident in this September 1934 photograph by architect Richard Koch, then in charge of HABS in Louisiana. Recorded in the David Olivier house at 4111 Chartres Street in New Orleans, dated ca. 1820 and since demolished, the iron plates bear a sunburst design. (HABS LA–70, LC HABS LA, 36–NEWOR, 49–7)

Figure 5 Iron paving blocks represent an extraordinary use of cast iron recorded by HABS in Philadelphia. The hexagonal flat pavers had an embossed geometric design and were laid in a considerable length of midtown sidewalk, alongside North Seventh Street. Victorian Age. HABS has recorded the beautiful rustic cast-iron fence protecting the Johnstone family plot in the cemetery of the Chapel of the Cross near Madison, Mississippi (fig. 11). Intertwining oak branches are combined with leaves and acorns beneath berried juniper for picturesque effect. Tall iron fences often guarded entire cemeteries, such as Boston's Mount Auburn and Brooklyn's Greenwood (Peatross, fig. 14), as well as private plots. Nineteenth-century landscape designers could not fail to exploit the possibilities of cast iron. Cast-iron figures and other elements populated public parks and private grounds throughout the century. Elegant Woodruff Place, laid out in 1872 in Indianapolis, Indiana, was conceived as such a suburban-dweller's dream, a bourgeois Versailles both enclosed and embellished by the versatile material.

Cast iron was a very democratic material in that it enabled families of modest means to have neat iron fences around their yards, pretty railings on their stoops, an attractive bench on the lawn, and even a useful umbrella holder and hatrack of iron in the hall. Upstairs all the children might have iron beds. Of course there would be iron tea kettles and skillets on the iron cookstove in the kitchen.

A more affluent family might have in addition lacelike iron cresting along the ridgeline of the roof of their house or accentuating its pavilions, peaks, and parapets. Charming iron balconies at the windows, elaborate urns for flowers in the yards, a cast-iron

Figure 6 The flask-casting method makes possible a form with a different design on front and back. This example is from the iron fence at the sidewalk's edge around the celebrated Dakota Apartments, built on New York's Upper West Side overlooking Central Park in 1883. Manufactured by the Hecla Iron Works in Brooklyn, this ornament presents the stern face of Neptune. The back shows Neptune's long locks surmounted by a crown. Sea monsters guard him. watchdog beside iron-railed steps, and even a bubbling iron fountain topped by a cherub struggling to hold a spouting iron fish were likely domestic appurtenances of the well-to-do.

Cast iron figured in the daily life of Americans in many ways. Nineteenth-century city dwellers found it all around them in the form of street furniture, both useful and ornamental. Myriad hitching posts once punctuated the streetscape. HABS fortunately recorded a nice sampling of these posts and other vanishing artifacts in a 1930s survey of ironwork in Mobile, Alabama (fig. 13), including lamp posts (Myers, fig. 41). The remarkable lighting fixtures which once adorned the terraces of Strickland's Tennessee Capitol would have been worthy of any European capitol (fig. 14). Even the figures are of iron. To achieve sufficient height, the old harbor beacon in Savannah, Georgia, used several iron sections rising from a polygonal base to a foliate top from which the beacon itself seemingly blossoms (fig. 15). The serviceable cast-iron column was sometimes called upon to support another once-common main street fixture, the bank clock. A handsome example of the sidewalk variety survives at the corner of Main and South First Street in Salt Lake City, where it has kept time for over a century (fig. 16).

The versatile cast-iron column is a form which can best exploit one of the material's most outstanding qualities, its load-bearing capacity. This ferrous alloy is so strong that it can be used sparingly and economically in thin-walled shapes like pipes and hollow columns. From the nineteenth century until this day, cast-iron pipe has provided towns and cities with services necessary for urban expansion, carrying water and gas for illumination, cooking, heating, and industry. HABS documentation of a multiplicity of cast-iron artifacts has focused on the nineteenth century, from early surveys of miscellaneous ironwork in cities as widely separated as Mobile and Chicago to more recent documentation of iron front buildings, reflecting the increased appreciation of a unique nineteenth-century building type. Cast-iron columns, used throughout the western world in building construction, are best seen in these buildings. They revolutionized nineteenth-century construction. It has been said that there are more iron columns in SoHo in lower Manhattan than there were stone columns in the whole of the antique world. HABS has recorded examples throughout the United States.

The U.S. Customhouse in Galveston, Texas, is a handsome example of the sophisticated mid-century use of cast iron by the Office of the Supervising Architect of the U.S. Treasury. Ammi B. Young's column designs, the subject of handsome published lithographs, were key elements in a neo-Palladian structure which brought something of the nobility of Vicenza to a remote American port city. Interior cast-iron columns proved equally serviceable substitutes for their stone counterparts and allowed the architects of the capitol buildings required by the rapidly

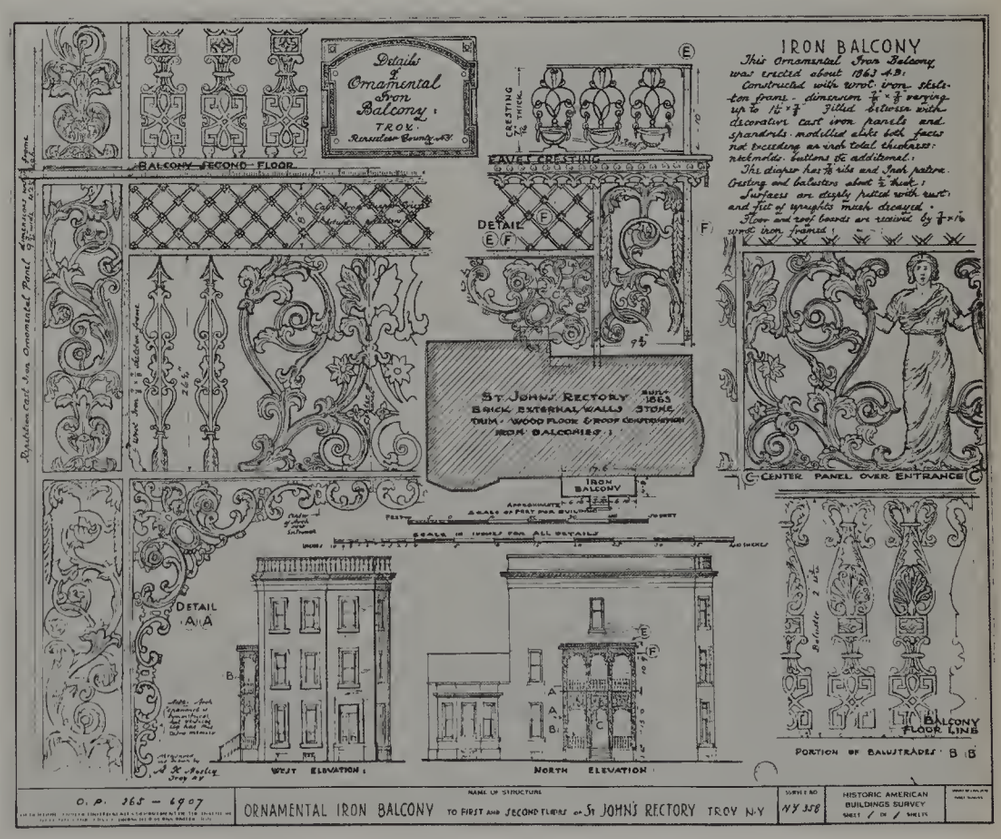

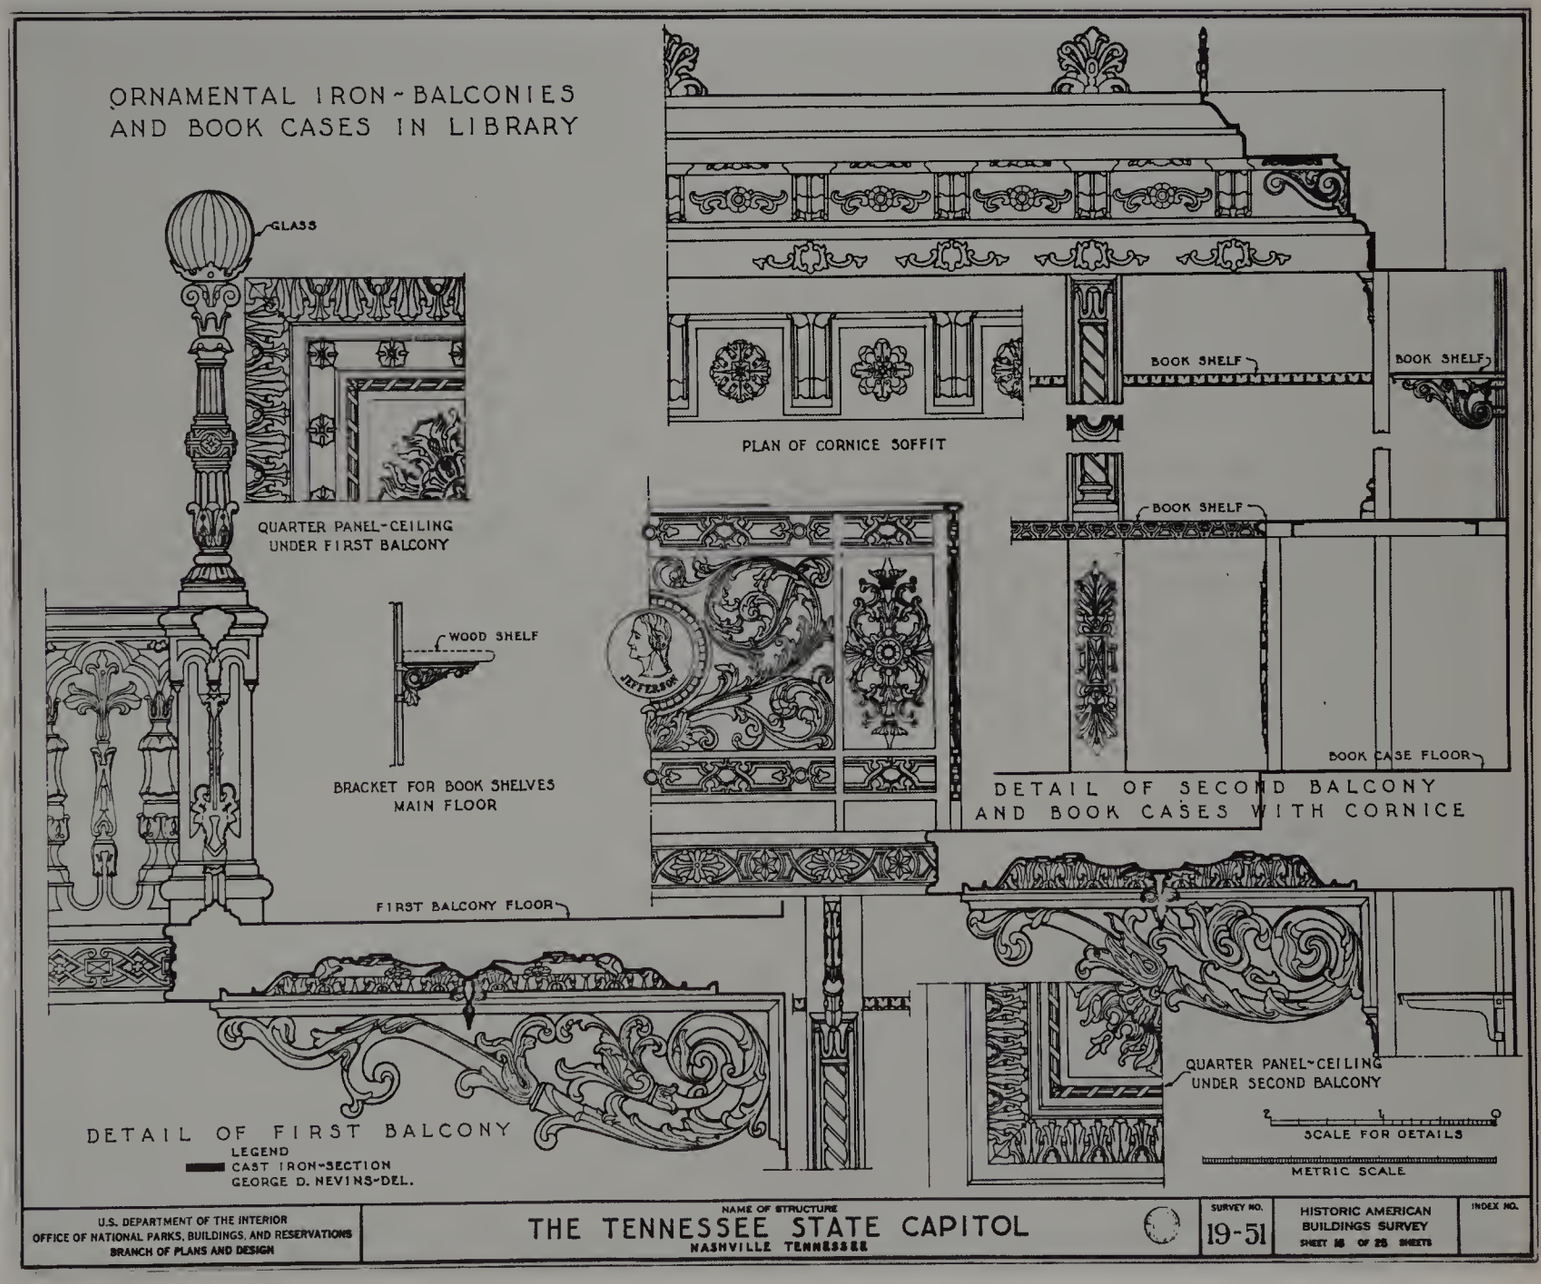

Figure 7 Sculptor John Frazee's Sub-Treasury railing was copied by others. Versions of it can be seen in New York City and elsewhere in the state, the two-story iron veranda of St. John's Rectory in Troy among them. Built in 1863 and demolished in 1936, it demonstrates various ornamental uses of cast iron. Measured drawing by A. H. Mosley, 1934. (HABS NY–358, sheet 1 of 1 sheet)

Figure 8 The Short-Moran House (Colonel Short's Villa), 1448 Fourth Street at Prytania, New Orleans, Louisiana, was begun in the summer of 1859 by architect Henry Howard. The house is notable both for its lace-like iron galleries and for its imposing length of cast-iron fence, the latter in the famous cornstalk pattern. The name Wood & Miltenberger, the New Orleans agent of the Philadelphia ornamental ironworks Wood & Perot, is embossed at the base of the fence posts. New Orleans, romantically identified with lovely iron verandahs in both the French Quarter and the Garden District, has had gallant preservation champions in the late Richard Koch and in Samuel Wilson, Jr., architects who deeply appreciated cast-iron architecture and over the years battled for its preservation. Wilson provided the following paragraph from the New Orleans Daily Picayune of July 7, 1852: "One of the most admirable innovations upon the old system of building tall, staring structures for business purposes is the plan, which we are glad to see is generally coming into use, of erecting galleries and verandahs of ornamental iron work." Obviously, houses as well as commercial structures benefited from this trend, which changed the face of many Southern cities. Photograph by Dan Leyrer, August 1963. (HABS LA–1112, LC HABS LA, 36–NEWOR, 60–2)

Figure 9 Libraries in public buildings and institutions sought in every way to reduce fire hazards in the nineteenth century, and cast-iron interior construction provided one answer. William Strickland's Tennessee Capitol, built at Nashville, 1845–59, was filled with charming ironwork cast by the Wood & Perot foundry, installed about 1858 and still intact. Two high galleries of iron bookstacks cover most of one wall and are reached by a cast-iron spiral stairway with perforated treads and risers and an extremely lacy railing highlighted by animal heads. Equally elaborate but quite different railings guard the narrow walkway along the galleries. Enwreathed foliate designs feature a row of iron rondels into each of which is cast a profile portrait of a famous philosopher or statesman. The galleries have ornate soffits and are held to the wall by elaborate acanthus brackets five feet in length. Because the original legislative reference collection has long since outgrown this library room in the capitol, the space now serves as a legislative meeting room. Measured drawing by George D. Nevins, 1934. (HABS TENN 19–15, sheet 18 of 23 sheets)

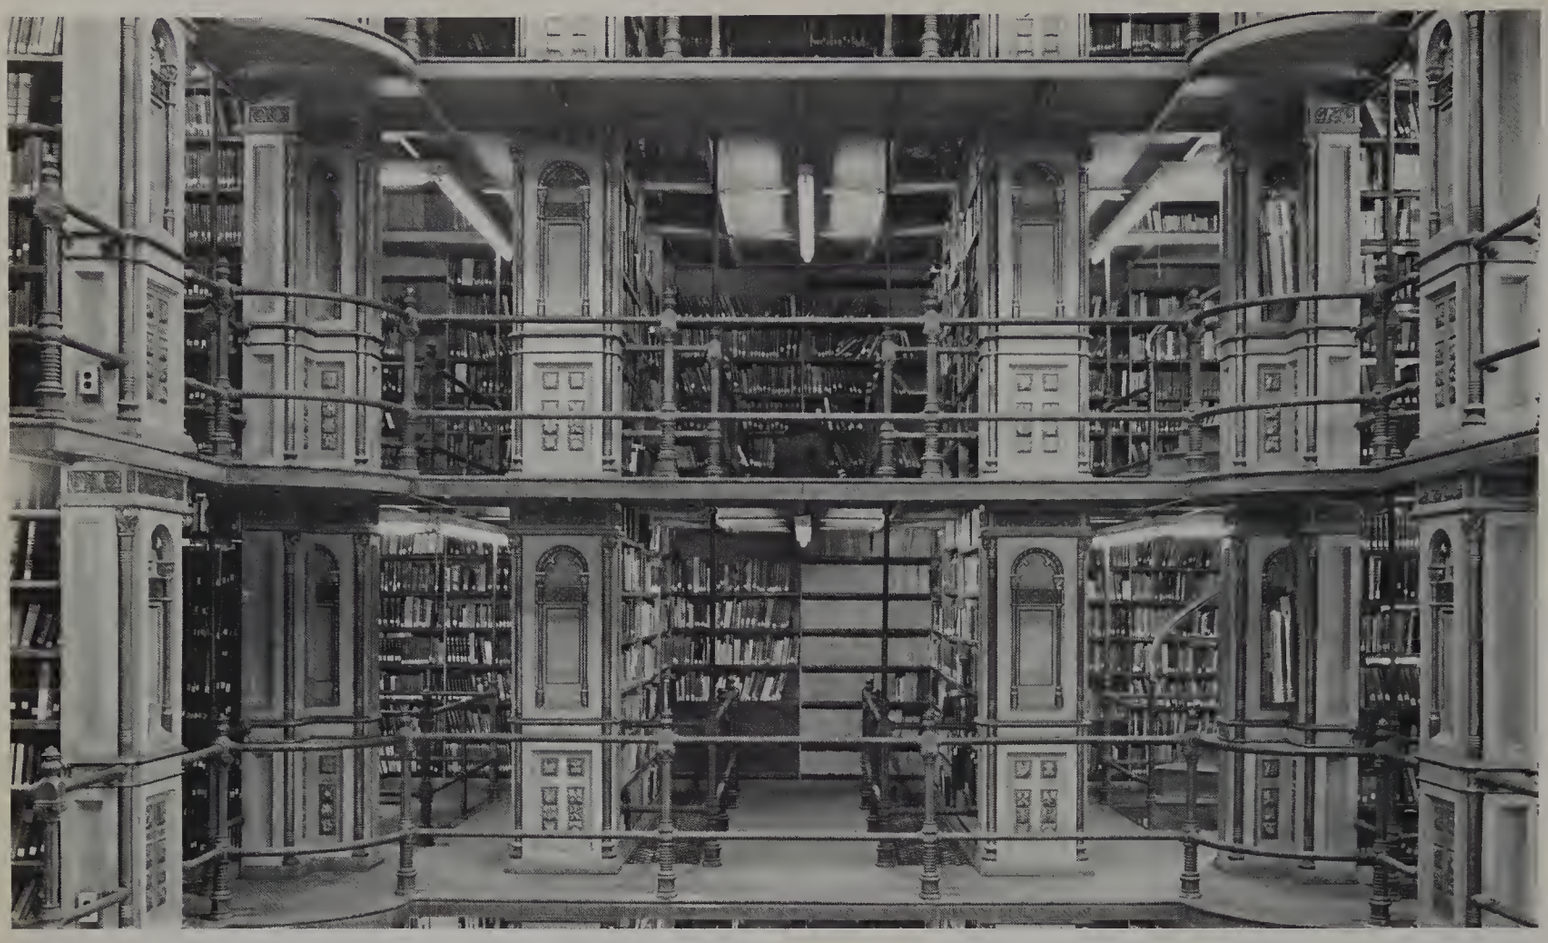

Figure 10 Completed in 1889, the Riggs Memorial Library forms one part of Georgetown University's Healy Building, begun in 1877 by the architectural firm of Smithmeyer & Pelz, which was also responsible for the 1897 Library of Congress building. Bookstacks in both structures made extensive use of cast-iron elements. The Riggs Library has cast-iron piers, some iron flooring, iron railings, and many levels of iron stacks. growing states to compete with one another in the creation of grand public spaces. Elijah Myers specialized in designs for state capitols and county courthouses from Illinois to Texas. Characteristic of his ornate Victorian interiors is the stairhall of the Michigan Capitol at Lansing (figs. 17,18, 19).

The greatest tests of the structural possibilities of cast-iron columns are found in industrial structures. Both the gasholder of the Petersburg, Virginia, Gas Light Company (fig. 20) and the Harlem (New York) Fire Watchtower (fig. 21) demonstrate how a minimum of cast-iron columns could be used to achieve both great height and stability. Such skeletal structures led the way for the iron and later steel framing which made possible the peculiarly American achievement, the skyscraper.

The history of the development of iron framing begins in England. Carl Condit observed in his American Building Art, the Nineteenth Century, "the decisive step in the direction of iron framing was the application of the material to columns" in England. Perhaps the first appearance of iron columns was in St. Ann's, Liverpool, in 1770. By 1779 the iron bridge had been placed across the Severn River at Coalbrookdale, a totally cast-iron monument that still stands for use by pedestrians. The Prince of Wales in ceremonies in July 1979 saluted its bicentennial and its restoration. Other cast-iron bridges followed, as well as aqueducts with cast-iron troughs to carry canals across streams. Recurring fires in English cotton mills drove owners to seek fireproofing. Iron columns began to replace wooden and masonry supports toward the close of the eighteenth century, and Charles Bage's spinning mill was built in Shropshire with both slender cruciform cast-iron columns and cast-iron beams in 1796. It is acknowledged to be the first metal-framed multistory building in the world, and it still serves as a working industrial structure.

Our friend William Strickland is regarded as the first architect to have employed iron columns in this country. In 1822 he supported "three rows of boxes resting on cast iron columns secured with iron sockets" in Philadelphia's Chestnut Street Theater, now gone. Five years later in the same city he used eighty-eight slender cast-iron columns quite differently to support the double-decked piazzas on both wings of the U.S. Naval Asylum. This structure still stands, an excellent candidate for a HABS recording project. The British-American architect John Haviland was also much interested in the innovative possibilities of cast iron, and in 1830 he veneered the front of a two-story bank in Pottsville, Pennsylvania, with flat cast-iron plates painted to resemble stone. This non-load-bearing system for iron building fronts, popular in the Philadelphia area, continued to be used for several more decades (fig. 28). The development of the load-bearing iron front was, however, to prove far more significant in the use of cast iron for the construction of entire buildings. Before looking at applications of these developments in commercial buildings, a glance at the increasing use of cast-iron elements in other nineteenth century structures is in order.

Perhaps the simplest and most

Figure 11 The ornamental possibilities of cast iron are usefully compared to those of wrought iron in this January 1934 measured drawing by Jay T. Liddle, Jr., and A. N. Town showing details of three iron fences guarding the cemetery lots of the Mannsdale, Mississippi, Chapel of the Cross. Detail B shows the Sutton family's fence, entirely of wrought iron with the possible exception of the palmette at the upper left. Detail C depicts the wrought iron gate capped by cast-iron decorations which opened to the Wiggins family plot. And detail A represents the dramatically more sculptural and organic forms of the entirely cast-iron fence erected by the Johnstone family. (HABS MISS 17–3, sheet 6 of 6 sheets)

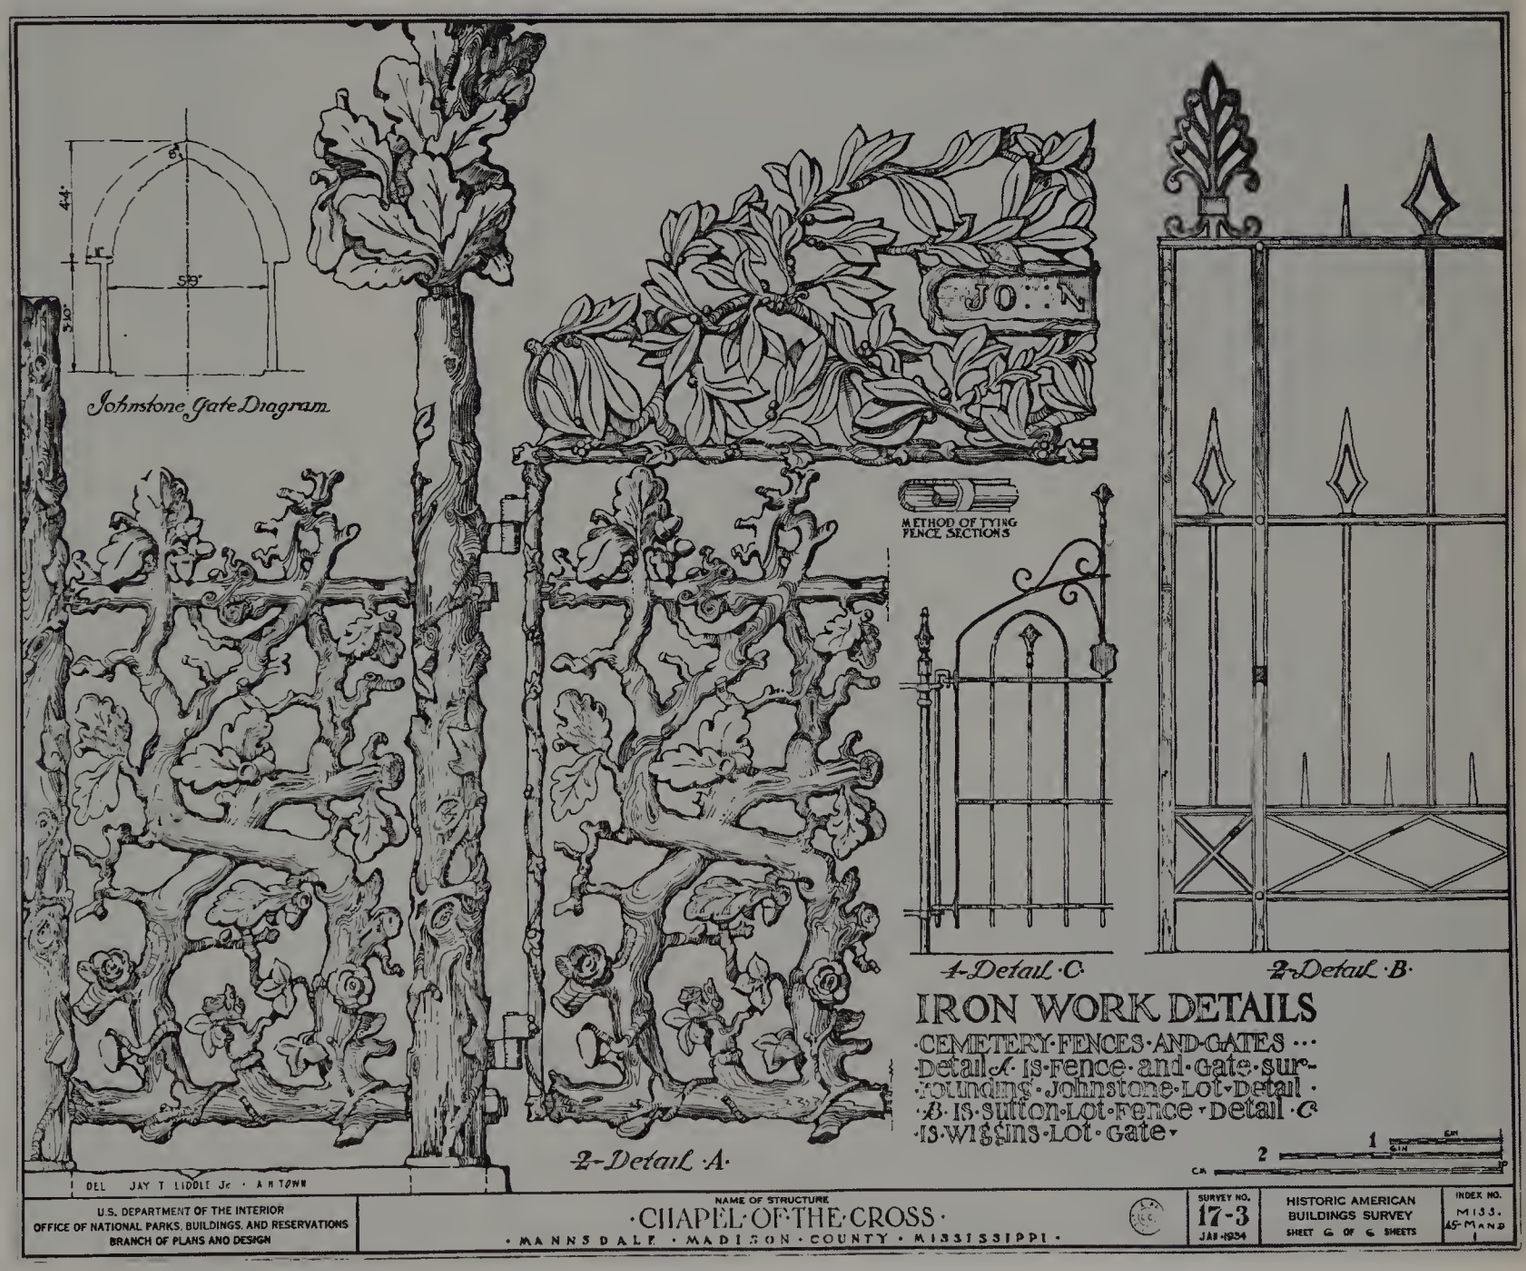

Figure 12 Along with fences, many other outdoor amenities were produced in cast iron, such as the embellishments for the malls of Woodruff Place, a subdivision laid out in 1872 in Indianapolis and recorded by HABS almost a century later. In the landscaped and planted malls were placed a variety of cast-iron adornments that included large iron urns or flower planters ornamented with cherubs and floral patterns. There were iron benches, iron statues (usually Grecian ladies on pedestals), ornamental lamp standards, and a series of iron fountains both large and small. Jordan L. Mott cast these popular Victorian pieces in his Bronx foundry and advertised them in folio catalogs illustrated with large wood engravings of his products. A number of these original nineteenth-century catalogs are available in the Case Book Collection of the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress as a supplement to the HABS collection. This illustration is a HABS photographic copy of a lithograph by Braden & Burford, ca. 1888, depicting the entrance to Woodruff Place, whose three esplanades were improved and ornamented between 1872 and 1877 at a cost of $250,000. (HABS IND–67, LC HABS IND, 49–IND, 22–1)

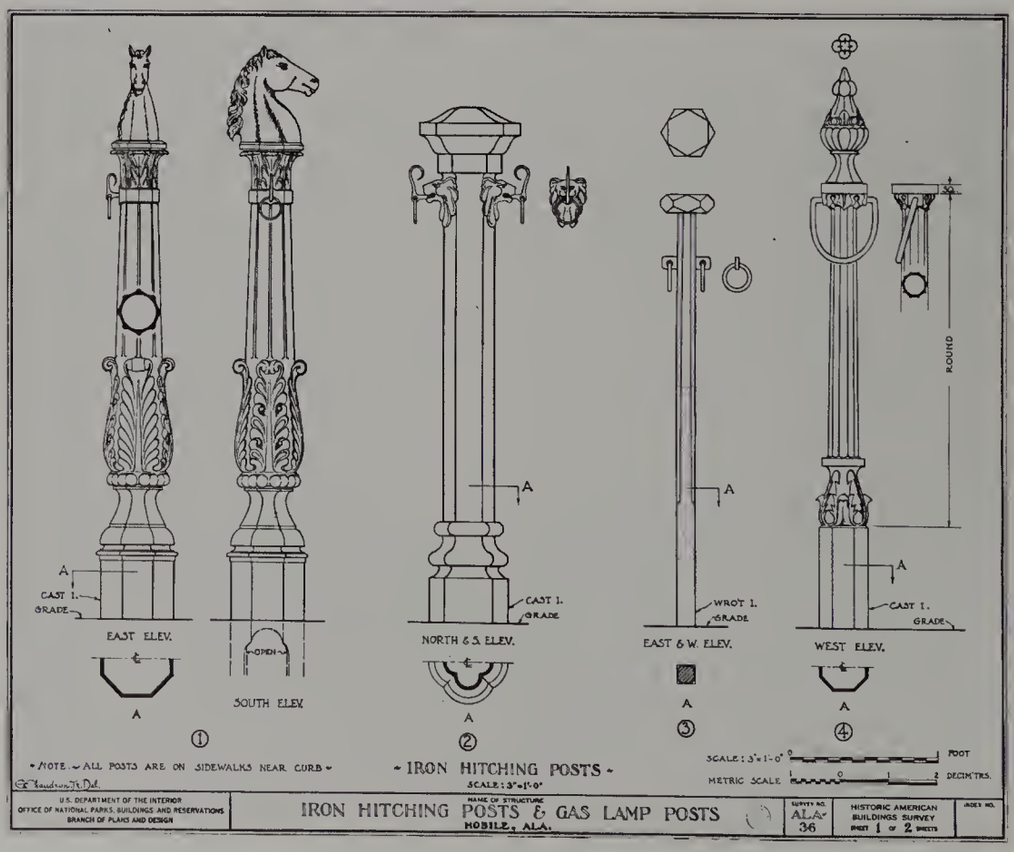

Figure 13 The 1935 HABS survey of iron street furniture in Mobile, Alabama, includes drawings of two gas lamp posts standing at that time as well as these iron posts for hitching horses. The four cast-iron posts are hollow and variously ornamented with acanthus, horses' and lions' heads, finials, and flutes. The single wrought iron example is solid with simple facets. Gateposts, fencing, and porch railings are also recorded in the Mobile survey, carried out in a city where to walk the streets is to study a textbook of beautiful and utilitarian urban cast-iron work. (HABS ALA–36, sheet 1 of 2 sheets)

Figure 14 Although HABS made record photographs of the Tennessee Capitol in 1934 and 1940, the remarkable iron lamp standards which flanked the south or principal entrance steps had already suffered the loss of their handsome capitals and lanterns. Their original form is preserved in the Ordway Collection in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress, which includes this 1862 image by a staff photographer for Mathew Brady. Three graceful, classically draped, life-size cast-iron figures encircle each lampstand's base. The ten-foot fluted column is surmounted by an ornamental lantern. A wartime barricade blocks the steps, where it is said cannon were at one time set up. (HABS TENN 19–51, LC–B811–2627)

Figure 15 HABS recorded Savannah's old harbor beacon in 1934. Produced in the ironworks of Wood & Perot, the very tall and graceful cast-iron standard was erected in 1858, and although it no longer serves as a beacon to mariners it is still well maintained. (HABS GA–232, LC HABS GA, 26–SAV, 23–1)

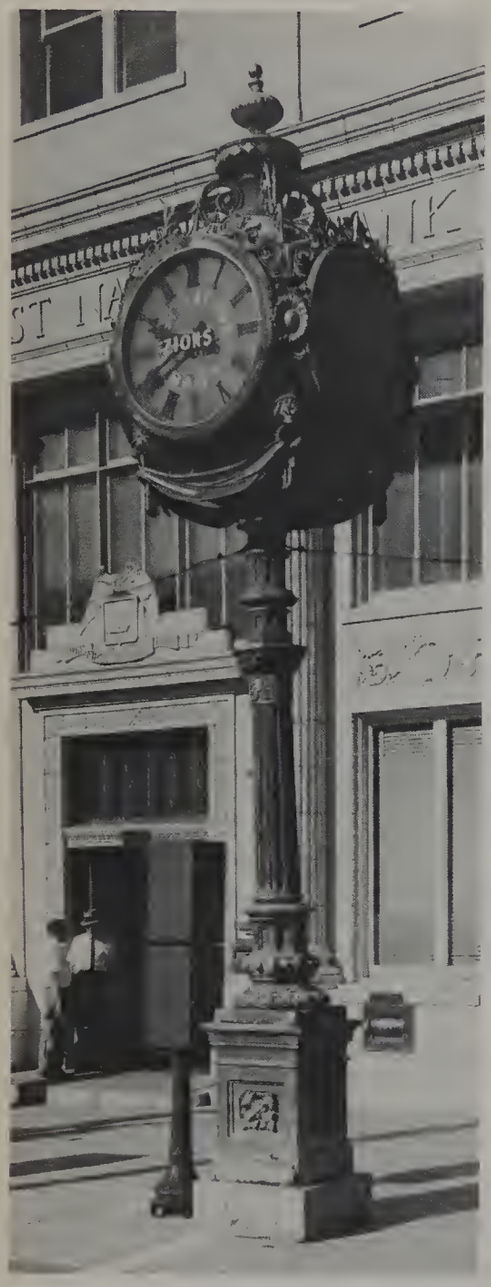

Figure 16 Utah provided an example of the cast-iron post clock. A Main Street landmark in Salt Lake City since about 1870, the Zion's First National City Bank clock reputedly had works which were first driven by a water wheel, later hand wound, then battery run, and finally fully electrified. Swags of metal drapery hang from its four large faces, draped through corner rings held by lion masks. This example is very like a Seth Thomas clock that for years stood on Lexington Avenue opposite Bloomingdale's store in Manhattan and is also reminiscent of a jeweler's clock still standing in downtown St. Louis. (HABS U–38,LCHABSUTAH,18–SALCI,12A–1)

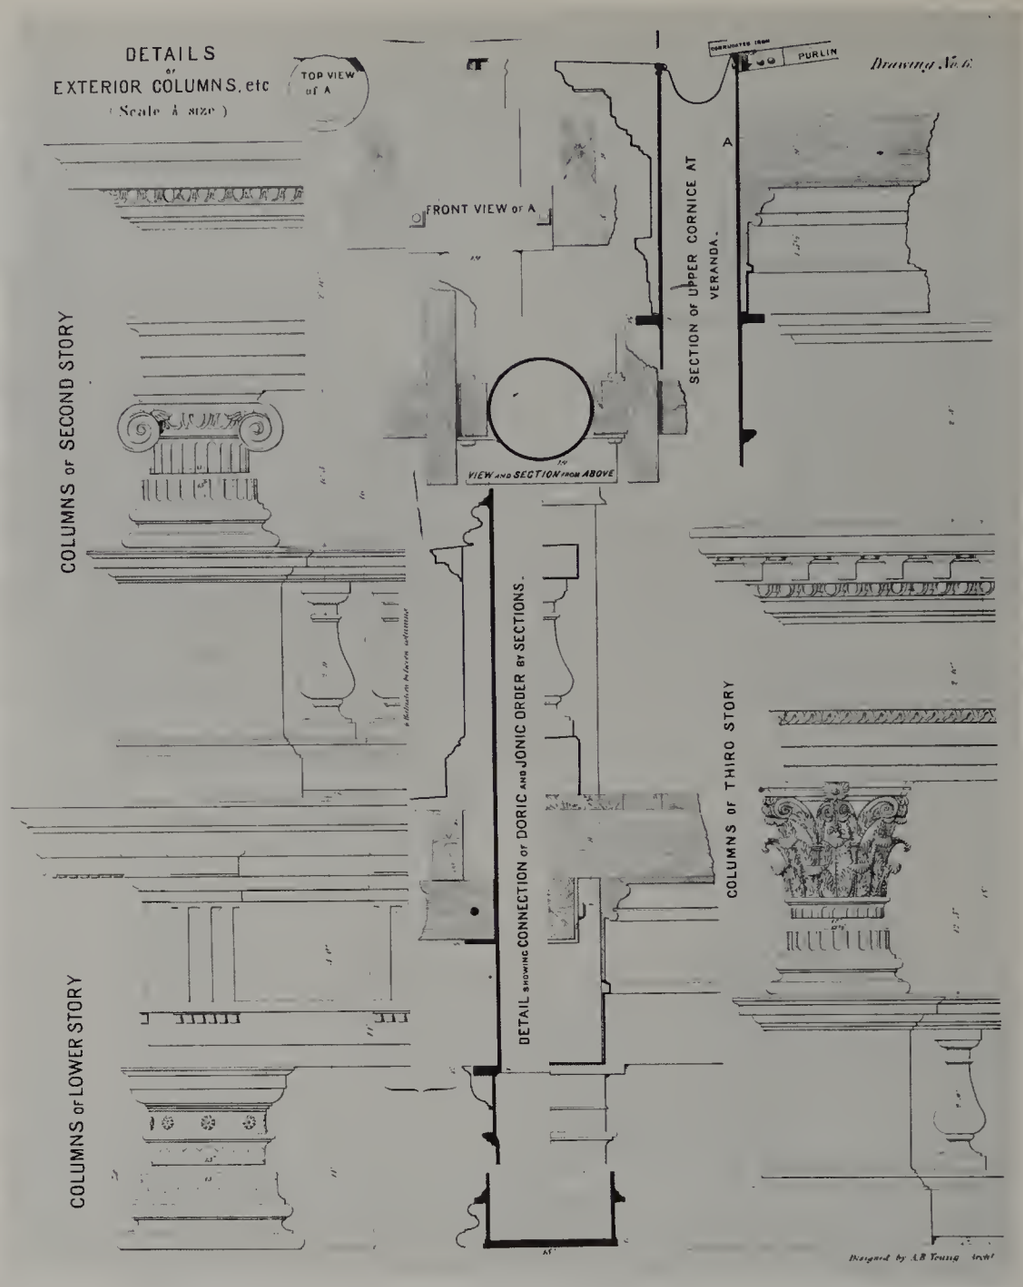

Figure 17 This handsome 1856 lithograph of a design by Ammi B. Young was one of nine printed by A. Kollner of Philadelphia and included in volume 29 of Plans of Public Buildings in Course of Construction under the Direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The publication illustrates a three-story pseudoperipteral scheme for the U.S. Customhouse at Galveston, Texas, quite different from the two-story structure with closed corner pavilions completed six years later (fig. 18). According to Young's design, seen here but later superseded, the customhouse would have followed classical principles in the proper superimposition of the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders. The sectional views demonstrate how iron and wooden members were to be joined. Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–58021)

Figure 19 State capitols, especially those built between 1850 and 1880, display noble tall iron columns in profusion. The Michigan Capitol at Lansing by Elijah E. Myers was no exception, constructed over a period of six years and completed in 1878. Here we see the cast-iron staircase leading up from the main floor, with tall paired columns on paneled bases. Similar iron columns are to be met throughout the structure's spacious main level. Other iron elements include the rotunda balustrade and the framing and exterior columns of the dome above it. The extensive HABS report written by Harley J. McKee in 1965 states that the prevailing interior colors are brown and yellow and warm dark red, together with certain deep blue-greens. Also notable are the wall and ceiling frescoes and the great brass chandelier, originally piped for gas. (HABS MICH–230)

Figure 18 This July 1936 HABS photograph by Harry L. Starnes shows the handsome use of forty-eight cast-iron columns on the exterior of the U.S. Customhouse in Galveston, Texas, as it was completed in 1861 to designs by Cluskey and Moore, contracted by Blandell and Emerson of Boston. Corinthian above and Ionic below, the columns form in-antis porticoes on the structure's longer north and south fronts while that on the west projects. Inside the brick structure are more iron columns, iron staircases, and apparently some early "Cooper Beams." Supervising Architect of the Treasury Ammi B. Young was an enthusiastic supporter of the innovative metal and often combined cast columns with wrought iron beams such as Peter Cooper had by 1854 succeeded in rolling in his Trenton, New Jersey, foundry. This customhouse has survived Galveston's disastrous storm in 1900, Hurricane Carla in 1961, and then a gas explosion in 1979 that knocked out the unadorned east wall, since repaired. When the structure was threatened with demolition, a federal judge who had presided in its courtroom led the local demands that it be saved. (HABS TEX–259, LC HABS TEX, 89–GALV, 12–1) common use of cast iron for domestic exteriors was for window and, less frequently, doorway lintels. Characteristic is the row house built in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, in 1859 by Francis Wheatley, where bold iron windowheads punctuate the brick front, combined with stylistically similar doorways and cornices in other materials (fig. 22). It is likely that the Wheatley lintels were stock items ordered from a dealer or catalog, whereas the more elaborate tripartite Gothic lintels of Ingelside in Lexington, Kentucky, were made in the owner's foundry to the designs of architect John McMurtry (fig. 23). Even the ornate crocketed spires of this handsome villa, completed in 1852, were cast of iron. Even more sophisticated are the traceried Gothic elements which make up the tomb of President James Monroe in the Hollywood cemetery in Richmond, Virginia (fig. 24). Erected in 1859 to the design of Albert Lybrock, an Alsatian emigrant, the structure is entirely of iron and was ordered from the Philadelphia works of Wood and Perot, despite the fact that Richmond was itself a center for the material's manufacture. Perhaps the ultimate combination of traceried Gothic elements in iron is to be found in the spectacular central rotunda of the old Louisiana Capitol at Baton Rouge as rebuilt by architect William A. Freret in 1880. Combining the form of an English chapter house with iron tracery filled with brightly colored glass, Freret created one of nineteenth-century America's most delightful and dramatic interiors (fig. 25).

The commercial uses of cast iron in this country, from storefronts to entire buildings, expanded yearly in both type and volume. Main street merchants could choose from a whole array of storefronts when building new structures or updating existing ones. Through a mid-century addition of a cast-iron front with large plate glass windows, an old red brick Greek Revival hotel in Athens, Georgia, was transformed into a flourishing commercial block (fig. 26). An iron storefront did many things for a commercial building. It opened up the facade to glazing, which allowed daylight to flood in. It permitted merchandise to be displayed in clear view of the passersby. It took up very little floor space. Such iron fronts became such a pervasive all-purpose type of iron architecture that virtually every little foundry in the country offered columns, piers, and colonettes made either from standard patterns or to custom designs. Seldom were these iron members called on to carry part of a building's floor load. For the most part they simply held up from two to five upper stories of a front wall built of wood, brick, stone, iron, or pressed metal.

The cast-iron front constituted an almost uniquely American development. It was an industrialized architecture in which mass-produced iron parts, many of them identical and interchangeable, could readily be delivered to nearby construction sites or shipped great distances. Looking back,

Figure 21 Iron fire lookout tower in Harlem's Marcus Garvey Park. This cast-iron structure was built in 1857 by Julius Kroehl from a design by James Bogardus, who had already built two even taller towers for the city's volunteer fire department. In the 1850s Bogardus had also erected two high shot towers along the same lines, adding brick curtain walls to prevent the wind from blowing hot shot out. These towers were in effect miniskyscrapers. As pioneer cast iron scholar Turpin Bannister wrote in 1957, they were probably the most prophetic of Bogardus's many inventions. Photograph, 1975. Figure 22 HABS records illustrate a variety of ways that cast iron was used in the decoration and construction of domestic buildings. This example, the town house of Francis Wheatley, was built in Georgetown, D.C., in 1859. It makes use of cast iron in a number of ways, for window lintels and sills, balcony and stair rails. Had the lintels been individually carved out of stone, their cost might have been prohibitive. Identical iron lintels were made from sand molds for which only one carved wooden pattern was required, making them relatively inexpensive. Widely used, such iron lintels can still be seen on both residential and commercial buildings in the older sections of most American cities and towns. Photograph by J. Alexander, June 1969. Figure 23 Joseph Bruen, who owned an iron and brass foundry in Lexington, Kentucky, commissioned architect John McMurtry to design this Gothic Revival house on Gibson Avenue. It was completed in 1852, and it is not surprising that its tripartite windows had iron lintels and sills and that the cornices, roof, and crocketed spirelets of this picturesque home were also of iron, made at the Bruen Foundry. Figure 24 Without question the most handsome cast-iron tomb structure in the nation is that marking the final resting place of President James Monroe in the Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, Virginia. On a bluff overlooking the winding James River, this masterpiece of cast-iron craftsmanship was designed in the Gothic style by Albert Lybrock of Richmond and produced by the famous Wood & Perot Foundry of Philadelphia. It was dedicated in 1859 with high military honors after Monroe's body had been moved to his native Virginia from the Marble Cemetery in New York City. Figure 25 The most romantic of all the state capitols may well be that designed by architect James Dakin for Louisiana, at Baton Rouge. The crenellated Gothic castle of 1850 overlooks the Mississippi River. Its interior was burned out during the hostilities of the Civil War and was rehabilitated after thirty years by New Orleans architect William A. Freret. His genius in the use of cast iron can be seen to best effect in the capitol rotunda, with its sweeping iron staircase and central clustered piers which rise ninety feet before breaking out into a great umbrella of traceried ribs filled with colored glass. Figure 26 HABS district officer Harold Bush-Brown recorded this red brick Greek Revival structure, formerly a hotel, in 1936 in Athens, Georgia. A high stoop once led to its main entrance above the ground floor, where stores were later inserted at street level. This transformation had been made possible by that popular American institution, the cast-iron storefront. Here we see the most basic post and lintel framing with cast-iron piers and horizontal members which carry the weight of the wall above. Cast iron being very poor for supporting weight, wrought iron beams were used as soon as they were successfully rolled in this country in the 1850s. Later, steel was the indicated metal, but use of cast-iron supports and columns persisted in storefronts well into the twentieth century because they were economical and handled the job so well. Figure 28 Shortly after the fire of July 9, 1850, swept Philadelphia's waterfront, a row of stores was erected at 238–48 Delaware Avenue in the "Burnt District" for John Brock Sons & Co. Joseph C. Hoxie and Stephan Decatur Button were the architects and they designed a two-tier storefront with pleasingly ornamented cast-iron arches glazed with wide windows for lighting the interior as well as for the display of merchandise. The upper three floors were of the Haviland system, veneered with plates of iron giving the appearance of rusticated ashlar masonry. The first stores were occupied by October 1850. Three foundries are stated in the HABS report to have provided cast-iron elements, perhaps to help achieve such remarkable speed. Only the two center stores (at 242–244 North Delaware Avenue) remained and were in use as a warehouse when HABS recorded them in 1970, when they were regarded as the oldest iron-front buildings in the country. Their fate was already sealed by highway development plans when fire raced through the empty structures September 26, 1977. Quick action by Richard Tyler of the Philadelphia Historical Commission secured funds for disassembly of the iron parts and for their storage, and some of these are now re-erected in the Smithsonian Institution. Figure 29 Often referred to as the Parthenon of iron-front buildings, E. V. Haughwout's store at 490 Broadway, at the corner of Broome Street in Manhattan, has attracted attention from the day it was built in 1856. It was recorded for HABS in 1968 by historian Diana Waite, with photographs by Cervin Robinson. Here we see the original color lithograph of the structure published by the manufacturer of its iron elements, Daniel B. Badger, as plate III in his 1865 catalog, Illustrations of Iron Architecture. The complex castings, which in style echo a Venetian palace, demonstrate the virtuosity of his firm. Now a city landmark, the Haughwout Building seemed doomed in 1968 when the proposed Broome Street Expressway received official endorsement. Urbanists Jane Jacobs and James Marston Fitch, among others, came to its defense. It is now included in the SoHo Historic District. Case Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–80409)

Figure 27 (opposite) The Edgar Laing Stores, northwest corner of Washington and Murray Streets, New York, New York. This structure, actually a group of five stores, was erected in only two months in 1849 by James Bogardus, a pioneer in the early use of cast iron for building purposes and a brilliant inventor. By the late 1850s Bogardus had commissions in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Chicago, San Francisco, and Havana. When the stores were demolished in 1971, the process was recorded by HABS to supplement measured drawings and photographs made in 1965–66. The structure was the earliest example of cast iron front architecture then remaining in the country. Thieves subsequently stole and sold for scrap the iron components of the Laing Stores as they lay enclosed by a chain link fence, stacked, cleaned, primed, and numbered for future reerection. Figure 30 As the time approached around 1940 for the clearance of some forty blocks of old warehouses along the St. Louis waterfront for the creation of the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial Park, now familiar to most because of Eero Saarinen's dramatic stainless steel arch, HABS recorded the iron front of the Thomas Gantt Building. Frank R. Leslie's measured drawing shows the spare iron-and-glass front at 219 Chestnut Street, a simple grid with the slenderest of columns between floor to ceiling windows and a sheet metal cornice. (HABS MO–1138, sheet 2 of 9 sheets) cast iron seems to have held more interest for the practical businessman who wanted a good-looking store or corporate headquarters at an affordable price—and often wanted it built with all speed possible—than for most of the architects to the Establishment.

Architects argued about what they regarded as aesthetic and moral problems posed by cast iron as a building material. Some said it was dishonest because it was cast in shapes that had originated in masonry. Others pleaded for designers to create a new architecture appropriate for the material. In fact, this happened by natural processes as builders and architects became more familiar with the potential of cast iron. A fragile looking, very nearly all-glass building facade became recognizable as an iron front. Quite simply, such a front—often five or six stores tall—could not have supported itself had its slender pillars been fashioned of stone, brick, or wood. They had to be of metal and, in the nineteenth century, before aluminum and steel, that could only be cast iron.

It remained for James Bogardus, a New York inventor of note, to erect in 1848 the first self-supporting multistory iron front combining pillars, cross beams, and infill spandrel panels for the refurbishing of Dr. John Milhau's old pharmacy on lower Broadway in Manhattan. He promoted the idea for making buildings entirely of iron, as he did his own factory in 1849. In 1850 he secured a patent for the fastening of iron parts and for iron roofing and flooring systems. Businessman Edgar Laing persuaded Bogardus to build a row of four-story iron-front stores on his downtown coalyard at the corner of Washington and Murray Streets in New York. Constructed in two months early in 1849, the Laing Stores survived until urban renewal dictated their removal in 1971 (fig. 27).

Protests at the destruction of this historic example that held within it the seeds of the skyscraper led to its being carefully dismantled and stored. Recognizing its significance and the uncertainty of its future, HABS recorded the structure in 1965, and additional photographs were made in 1971 as it was being taken down. Those images reveal how a sophisticated early iron front was joined to a building of conventional warehouse construction, with brick bearing walls and heavy wooden floor construction. HABS has recorded a great variety of iron-front buildings throughout the United States, ranging from what has been called the Parthenon of such structures, New York's E. V. Haughwout Store at 490 Broadway, a commercial palace in the Venetian style whose complex castings were the pride of Daniel Badger's architectural ironworks (fig. 29), to the far simpler Thomas Gantt Building in St. Louis, Missouri, whose broad planes

Figure 31 In 1967 HABS recorded Salt Lake City's Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution (ZCMI) Department Store, whose distinctive iron front had begun with seven bays in 1877 and been extended with matching units over the subsequent ninety years to a width of twenty-three bays. of glass and minimal metal structure prophesied the future of the American tall building (fig. 30). The cast-iron front of Salt Lake City's Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution (ZCMI) Department Store evolved over a period of more than ninety years, and was recently taken down, repaired—including the recasting of many elements—repainted, and reerected as a more or less freestanding screen a few feet in front of the new store building behind it (fig. 31). The Hart Block in Louisville, Kentucky, on the other hand, represents a sophisticated composition using a large Néo-Grec cast-iron vocabulary (fig. 32). Windows on each floor differ from those of floors above, alternating segmentally arched windows with square-headed windows. All are separated by very delicate ironwork in the form of freestanding colonettes, both paired and single. The rich diversity which these fronts contribute to our cities has at last been recognized, and the wholesale destruction of cast-iron districts—such as the forty blocks cleared along the St. Louis waterfront before World War II—has been arrested.

Even in the years that buildings with cast-iron exteriors were proliferating, architects primarily in Chicago and New York were putting up increasingly taller buildings with interior frames of cast-iron columns and wrought iron beams, and eventually with steel beams when they became affordable. In Chicago HABS has recorded two such structures. Burnham and Root's eleven-story Rookery, built between 1886 and 1888, was named for a site where flocks of pigeons had gathered. Its frame of cast-iron pillars and wrought iron beams wraps around a central light court, the lower two floors of which form a lobby covered by an iron-and-glass ceiling supported by perforated cast-iron members (Myers, fig. 27). The richly detailed cast iron of its lobby was originally designed by John Root and produced in Brooklyn's famous Hecla Iron Works. Hecla partner William H. Winslow was sent to Chicago in 1885 as a young man, to plan the work for the lobby. He settled there and formed his own nationally known ornamental iron business. He is perhaps best known as a friend and patron of the young Frank Lloyd Wright, who called on Winslow to produce his own brand of ornament in iron, including the 1905 remodeling of the Rookery lobby (Myers, fig. 28). Just south of the Loop at 431 South Dearborn Street stands William LeBaron Jenney's sixteen-story Manhattan Building, for a time the world's tallest building. It is a monument to Jenney; to his engineer, Louis E. Ritter, who was responsible for its framing system; and to the cast-iron column. Its skeleton consists of hundreds of cast-iron pillars and wrought iron beams and girders resting on heavy foundations of concrete and iron rails.

The all-iron structure represents the ultimate use of this material, and several quite different examples have been recorded by HABS. The Watervliet Arsenal building is one of a kind. Almost totally of iron, it was designed on the eve of the Civil War for the storage of gun carriages at Watervliet, near Albany, New York (fig. 33). It is an outstanding case of early prefabrication, yet is surprisingly ornamental. Erected in the summer of 1859, its iron sections had been designed and cast in the big iron foundry of Badger's Architectural Ironworks over the winter and were ready to ship up the Hudson when the ice melted in the spring. The foundation was prepared and waiting and the iron parts could be immediately assembled and bolted together at the site.

The arsenal was surveyed by HAER staff especially trained to recognize and record this nation's technological triumphs. Iron bridges are another example of technology recorded. None are more picturesque than the bowstring truss bridges based on Squire Whipple's inspired design, patented April 24, 1841. The truss bridge

Figure 32 In Kentucky's old Louisville Restoration Area, near the Ohio River, stand several iron-front buildings that have received new recognition in recent years. The most remarkable of these is the Hart Building, an ornate five-story former hardware warehouse at 728 West Main Street. Windows on each floor differ from those of the floor above, segmental arched windows alternating with square-headed ones. All are separated by very delicate ironwork in the form of free-standing colonnettes, some paired and some single. The front is organized into three units, each defined by a handsome perforated arch spanning four bays. The mode is Neo-Grec and one is reminded of Richard Morris Hunt's very original 1874 iron front in New York City's SoHo district. Old photographs show a large metal pediment, since blown away in a storm, which read "Hart Block 1884." Its history is further revealed on the base of the street-level iron plasters where the words "Charles E. Meyer, Architect" and "Merz Architectural Iron Works" are embossed. (HABS KY–120, sheet 3 of 3 sheets)

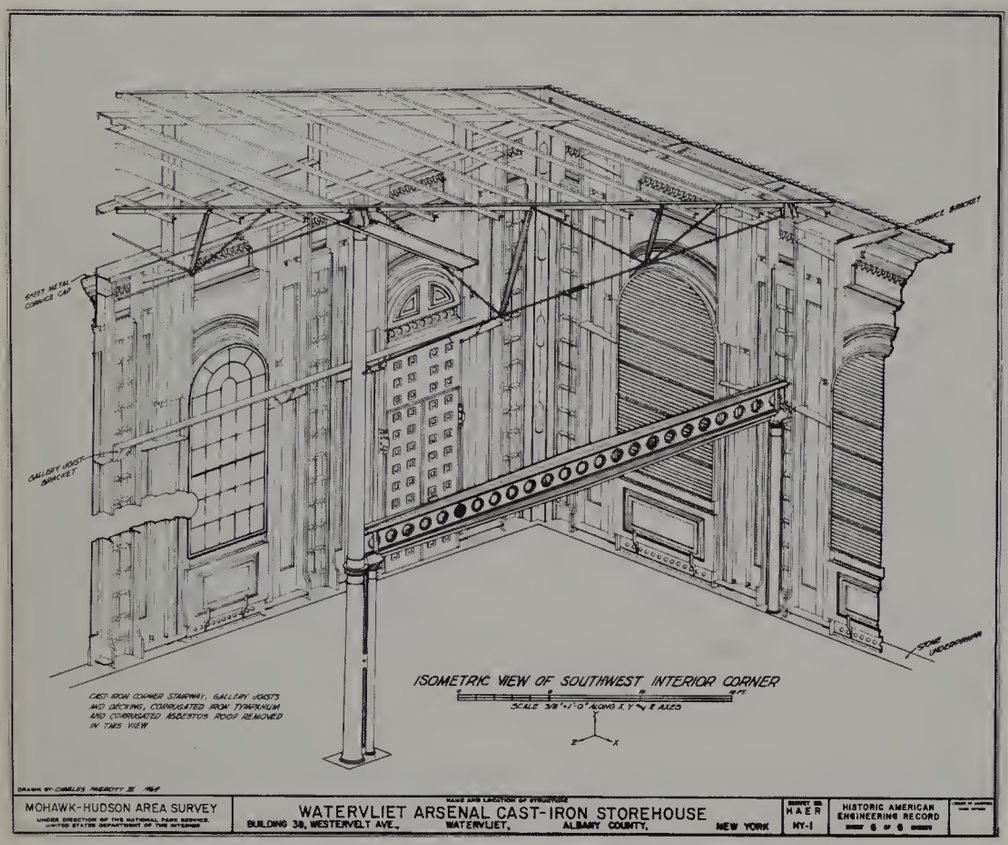

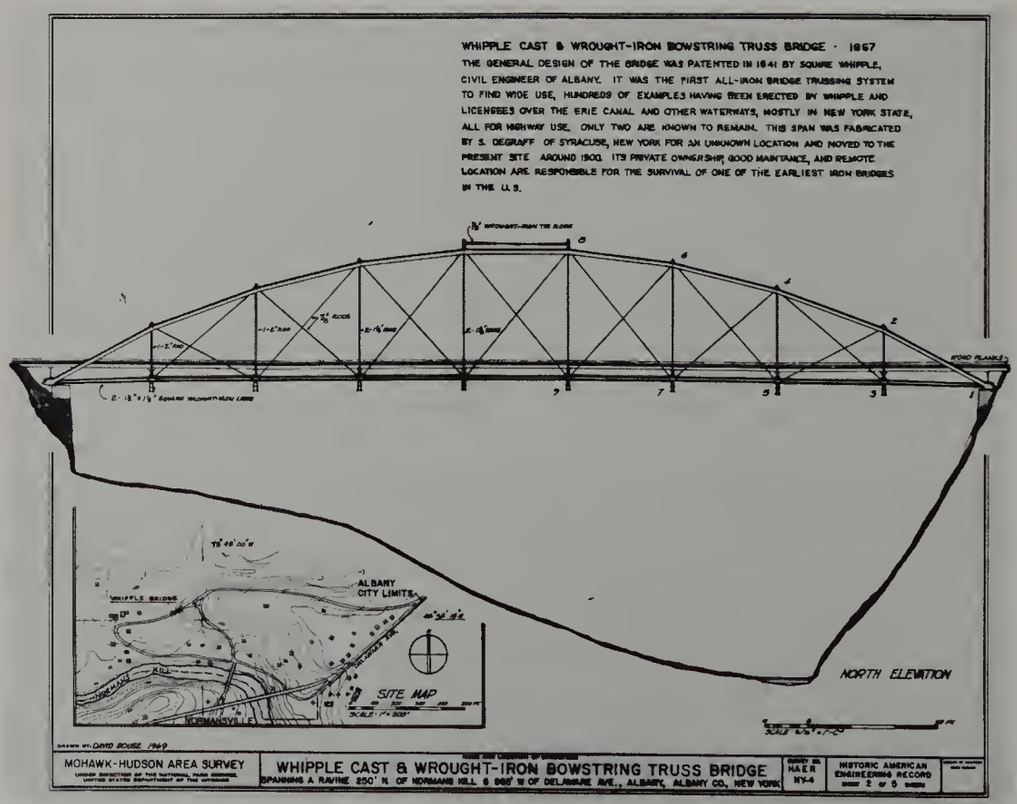

Figure 33 Isometric view of the southwest interior corner of the cast-iron storehouse of the U.S. Army Arsenal at Watervliet, Albany County, New York. This cutaway perspective allows us to understand more readily the all-iron construction of this unusual building. In 1857 Major Alfred Mordecai, the arsenal's commanding officer, wanted a totally fireproof warehouse for the storage of new gun carriages awaiting shipment. In a chance meeting at West Point he was introduced to J. M. Reed, the president of Daniel Badger's Architectural Ironworks. Thus this structure—made with iron plates and paired pilasters for walls, many iron-framed floor to ceiling window units for natural illumination, and iron shutters for security—came to be. Iron stairs, sheet-iron gable sheathing, sheet-iron roof, and wrought iron trusses supported by cast-iron pillars completed the ensemble. Measured drawing by Charles Parrott, 1969. Figure 34 North elevation and site map, Whipple cast-iron and wrought iron bowstring truss bridge, near Albany, Albany County, New York. Another important use of iron was in nineteenth-century American bridges. Squire Whipple's patented truss of 1841 was among the more popular of many innovative designs for iron crossings. is a small work of art, so directly conceived with a top arched chord of cast iron tied at the base with square wrought iron tie rods and floored with wooden planks. Whipple, a civil engineer in Albany, was meeting the need for the road crossings over the new Erie Canal. Although scores of these bowstring truss bridges were built over the canal and other New York waterways by Whipple and his licensees, very few survive today. The one recorded in 1969 by HAER was originally constructed in 1867; it was moved about 1900 to carry a private road over a ravine near Albany (fig. 34).

The final all cast-iron structure we shall mention, Maine's Portland Breakwater Lighthouse, does not figure largely in any great cycle of technological evolution (fig. 35). It is simply quite lovely, representing the dignity and durability of which one of the most versatile of American building materials is capable. First built in 1855 and rebuilt in 1875, this iron essay in Corinthian architecture was abandoned in 1943. Its 1962 HABS record includes photocopies of the original architectural drawings discovered in the district office of the U.S. Coast Guard, its owner. It is one more example of the role played by the Historic American Buildings Survey in recognizing and recording the role of cast iron during and since the nineteenth century. Continuing survey projects by HABS, together with those of the Historic American Engineering Record, enlarge our understanding of the forms and technology of America's remarkable cast-iron age.

Vernacular Construction in the Survey

by

CARL LOUNSBURY

In December 1933 the Washington office of the newly established Historic American Buildings Survey issued general instructions to its district officers in the field which outlined the vast scope of this new federal program. The project directors contemplated "measuring and recording the complete field of Early American Architecture from the earliest aboriginal structures to the latest buildings of the Greek Revival period." From the outset they envisioned a survey which included "structures of all types, from the smallest utilitarian structures to the largest and most monumental. Barns, bridges, mills, toll houses, jails, and in short buildings of every description" were to be covered so that "a complete picture of the culture of the time as reflected in the buildings of the period may be put on record." Recognizing these goals to be extremely ambitious, the directors established a set of priorities which gave precedent to "buildings of architectural or historical interest, or buildings of unusual type, or buildings exhibiting features of plan or design which have not been restored or remodeled and which are in imminent danger of destruction or material alteration."[1]

With their instructions to record common utilitarian structures, the HABS directors considered the vernacular buildings of the American landscape to be an integral part of the country's architectural heritage. Although the term vernacular architecture has been expanded in recent years to encompass a broad range of building forms, from nineteenth-century pattern book houses to the modern commercial strip, it has customarily been applied to traditional farmhouses and agricultural buildings. The Survey's treatment of the rural buildings of this latter, more restricted definition forms the subject here considered.

In contrast to academic architecture, the vernacular buildings of the rural landscape were erected by their owners to accommodate particular needs and activities without benefit of formal plans. Although the functional aspects of such buildings dominated the plans, these buildings were in general not devoid of some aesthetic considerations in execution. Built according to local custom with native materials, farmhouses, barns, and associated agricultural

Through the use of local materials and the development of house types which best suited social and economic conditions of a particular area, vernacular building in the American colonies by the mid-eighteenth century had formed distinctive regional characteristics. Figure 2 Hancock House, Hancock Bridge, New Jersey. Although the primary concern of vernacular builders was to provide functional structures, they could also provide aesthetically pleasing buildings through the decorative treatment of materials. The gable-end patterning of glazed headers as shown here in the Hancock House was characteristic of brickwork in the mid-Atlantic colonies in the eighteenth century for embellishment of otherwise relatively plain and stark walls. Drawing by E. Ray Coutch, 1935. (HABS NJ 6–54, sheet 19 of 19 sheets) buildings "took such form as best served their owner's occupations and household habits."[2]

The recording of vernacular buildings by HABS has proceeded in an uneven fashion over the past fifty years. The number and variety of structures that have been inventoried as well as the quality of the fieldwork have varied greatly over time and from state to state. Collectively, the product of fifty years in the field appears impressive, yet, if studied regionally or by building type, the HABS collection has several weaknesses. In states like New Jersey and Massachusetts which have had active survey programs since the 1930s, the voluminous photographs and measured drawings of barns, mills, and farmhouses provide the historian of vernacular architecture with a rich source of material. In other areas, early HABS teams fortunately recorded many derelict rural buildings threatened with decay and destruction which otherwise would have vanished unnoticed. Well over half of the two dozen eighteenth-century farmhouses that Thomas T. Waterman investigated in the Albemarle region of northeastern North Carolina are now destroyed and but for his exemplary HABS fieldwork in the summer of 1940 would have been lost altogether. But, although the HABS files may contain a number of important buildings which have since been altered or demolished, those scholars interested in traditional house types and agricultural buildings in states such as New Hampshire, Arkansas, and North Dakota will be disappointed by the paucity of information to be had. The recording of vernacular buildings for HABS has scarcely begun in many states, particularly those beyond the East Coast. The mid-to-late nineteenth-century farmhouses of the upper Midwest, many of them exemplary of ethnic building practices, still await more detailed investigation by HABS.

Much of the early fieldwork concentrated on recording buildings designed with some academic pretensions, embellished with abundant stylistic details. This was natural considering the priorities established by the Washington office and the architectural training of some of the members of the field teams. Outside peripheral antiquarian interests in old houses in regions like New England and the Chesapeake, the recording of simple farm buildings for their architectural qualities had little precedent when HABS fieldwork began.

In Massachusetts and Virginia, two states which had strong HABS programs during the depression, most of Figure 5 White House, Perquimans County, North Carolina. The HABS collections often contain documentary information on buildings that have been destroyed in the last fifty years. The White House is one such example. Without Thomas T. Waterman's fieldwork in this area of northeastern North Carolina, many important eighteenth-century buildings would have disappeared unrecorded. Figure 6 The Buttonwoods barn, near Newcastle, Delaware. Although HABS documentation of agricultural buildings has been limited, those that have been recorded range from substantial brick and stone barns in the Delaware Valley to log outbuildings in Kentucky (fig. 7), fanciful icehouses in New Jersey (fig. 8), and mule-driven cotton gins in the South (fig. 9). the fieldwork covered buildings which were perceived to be the earliest and which had some connections with important historical figures and events. Thus in Massachusetts there was an attempt to record houses and structures associated with Pilgrim and Puritan settlements of the seventeenth century. In this effort HABS photographed and measured what was considered the distinctive vernacular house type of New England, the clapboard-covered frame house characterized by a center chimney and steep roof line. In Virginia, surveyors perceived the most important period of architectural development as one that neatly led up to and coincided with the American Revolution. Eighteenth-century plantation houses set dramatically along the main rivers became the principal objects of the HABS teams. The fact that the Carters, Lees, and other families associated with the Revolution built and lived in these plantation houses left little doubt that they would receive full attention.

This work in Massachusetts and Virginia was important but naturally forced the Survey to devote little time to the smaller and more characteristic buildings of these states. The early work also tended to reinforce notions about building in these states which were misleading. In Virginia, the early attention devoted to the brick mansion houses wrongly led many architectural historians to assume that brick building was more prevalent than it actually was in the eighteenth century.

In a review of the comprehensive HABS catalog published in 1941, Turpin C. Bannister praised the intention of the program but wisely pointed out several deficiencies in the scope of the Survey. Among them, he noted an uneven coverage both geographically and chronologically in many states and found "little assurance, as yet, that one consults a typical cross section" of house types in the Survey.[3] It is this randomness of the recording process inherent in a national survey that has limited the usefulness of HABS materials in the study of traditional buildings. The study of vernacular architecture must proceed with a systematic and careful investigation of a large sample of buildings in a given area in order to distinguish common house types, materials, and structural systems. Unlike the study of academic architecture where emphasis is placed on the analysis of individual buildings of exceptional character, the study of vernacular forms depends on the recognition of the repetitive and commonplace. Too few buildings in a survey may distort the overall picture.

By covering large numbers of buildings within a concentrated area, comprehensive field surveys make it possible to detect patterns in vernacular building. The small Theophilus White house in Perquimans County, North Carolina, has few architectural details or historical associations which would cause it to merit attention on its own. Little can be made of room use or the building's social context if it is viewed in isolation. Only when this simple house type is examined in conjunction with large numbers of structures in surrounding areas does its significance begin to emerge. Comprehensive surveys produce the social cross section of house types which can then be compared and contrasted with vernacular buildings nearby and with those of other regions. Intensive fieldwork in Perquimans County has made it possible to identify the Theophilus White house as a prevalent house type of the eighteenth century tobacco-growing society of the greater Chesapeake.[4] This recognition in turn has allowed historians to describe the social and economic activities for which this building form was designed.[5] The work of interpreting vernacular architecture begins for the historian, folklorist, or geographer only after the general pattern of building in an area has been established. Since HABS fieldwork has only occasionally reached the point where it has canvassed a typical cross section of building types within a region, it has not been regarded as an essential tool in vernacular studies.

If not essential, the HABS collection can nonetheless be useful to vernacular studies in a number of ways. During the 1930s HABS teams in Ala-

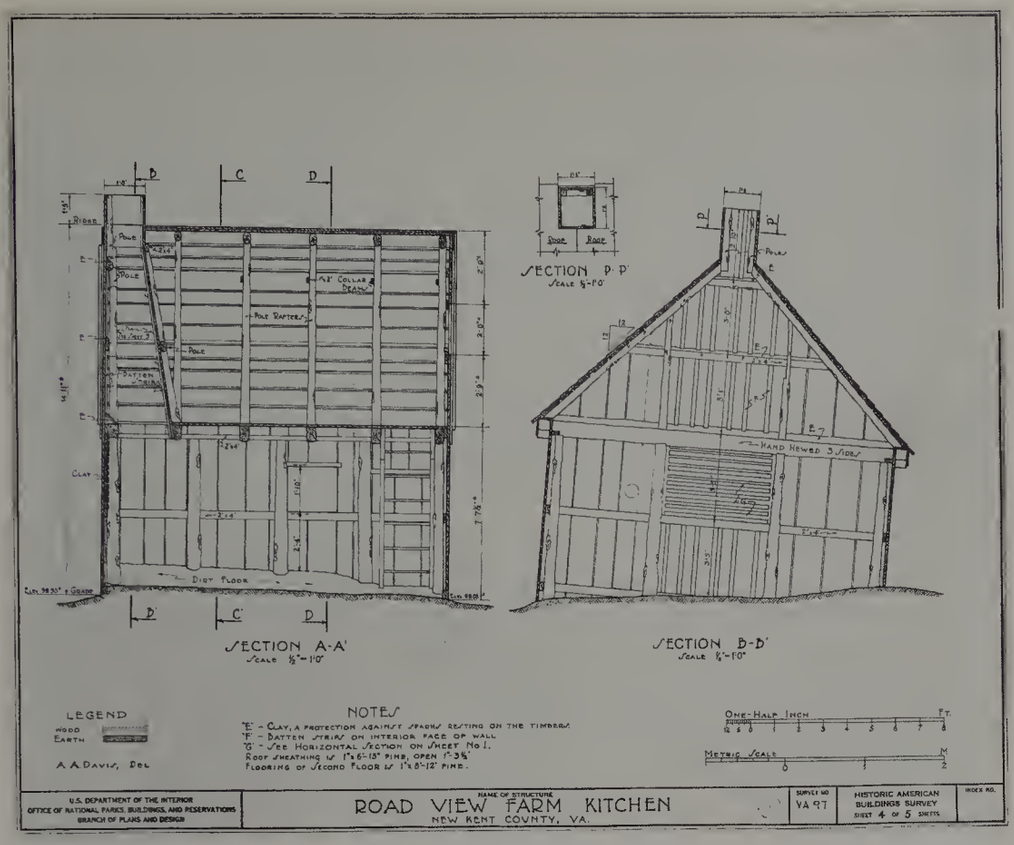

Figure 17 Kitchen, Road View Farm, section, New Kent County, Virginia. The mud-and-stick chimney, once a common impermanent building feature through much of the South, has rapidly disappeared in the second half of the twentieth century. The HABS collection fortunately has several recorded examples, including the Road View Farm kitchen in New Kent County, Virginia, and a log house in Sampson County, North Carolina (fig. 18). bama recorded scores of great antebellum mansions erected by the prosperous cotton planters in the quarter century preceding the Civil War. In Alabama, unlike most states, the surveyors did not neglect the complement of domestic and agricultural buildings which surrounded the main houses. More kitchens, slave quarters, and log outbuildings were photographed and measured than in any other state. Detailed site plans showing the relationship of the main house to its subordinate buildings were frequently made. These are invaluable to social historians studying the spatial arrangements of slavery, since the plans clearly outline the division of the plantation into realms of shared and exclusive space among masters, overseers, and slaves. The early photographs often reveal how tenants in the first third of the twentieth century continued traditional folkways in many matters such as the maintenance of swept yards enclosed with worm and paled fences.

Many of the slave houses and outbuildings were constructed with flimsy materials in an impermanent manner and have not survived the last fifty years. HABS recorded dozens of such buildings erected with stick-and-clay chimneys, dirt floors, shake roofs, and wood block foundations in Alabama and, to a lesser degree, in other southern states. These features, once characteristic of the lowest level of vernacular building, have grown increasingly rare since the 1930s. When Albert Simons photographed the small frame house near Cross in Berkeley County, South Carolina, in 1935, tenant houses with the same roughly worked materials could be found along almost any road in the state. Now features such as the clay-and-stick chimney have virtually disappeared. In North Carolina less than a handful of these rude chimneys survive. Combined with the photographs taken for the Farm Security Administration during the depression, the HABS collection provides one of the best documentary sources for the study of impermanent construction in the South.

Since many traditional structures possess few stylistic details which can aid in determining periods of construction,

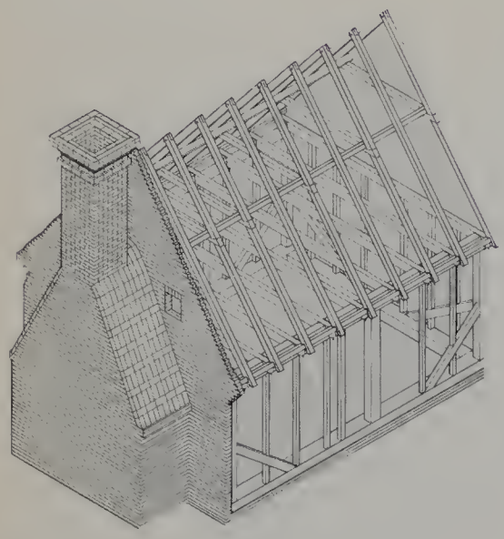

Figure 19 Isometric of framing and brick end, Pear Valley, Northampton County, Virginia. Building technology has been a matter of great concern in the study of vernacular architecture. Structural details of a building often aid in determining its age, help distinguish subsequent changes, or reveal the origins of its builders. (HABS VA–960, sheet 5 of 5 sheets) a firm understanding of building technology has been an important concern in vernacular studies. An analysis of construction details, hardware, and materials can offer clues to the age of a building as well as leading to answers to broader questions about the relationship between traditional and industrialized building practices. A random sampling of HABS files reveals that the documentation of structural systems and details by field teams has increased over the last twenty-five years. In Mississippi, for example, the drawings of Mount Locust, a late eighteenth-century frame house that was expanded several times in the nineteenth century, demonstrate a sensitive concern for construction methods. The sections and exploded isometric drawings provide clear illustrations of the different building periods as evidenced in the wall-framing system. This attention to detail can also be found in material compiled by Survey members in New Jersey during the 1930s. In recording more than two hundred eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century farmhouses, surveyors carefully documented locks, hinges, and kitchen hardware. By leafing through these drawings along with those of Pennsylvania, one can obtain a thorough introduction to the decorative and functional ironwork of the mid-Atlantic colonies. Such knowledge facilitates the dating, interpretation, and understanding of regional building types and techniques.

The serious study of vernacular architecture is relatively new. Twenty years ago comprehensive survey techniques and the classification of comparable building examples had scarcely begun. Even today, traditional farmhouses in many parts of the country await much-needed fieldwork. If HABS is to play an important role in vernacular studies, it must encourage contributions from public and private organizations which oversee local field surveys. State surveys, now being conducted under the auspices of the National Register program, could upgrade their recording procedures to the quality of HABS standards and, by sharing their material, augment HABS coverage of vernacular buildings. Such a cooperative arrangement was established in the 1970s among the Many early HABS teams failed to document evidence of previous changes made to a building but merely recorded the building as it existed at the time they were recording it. St. Mary's City Commission, the Maryland Historical Trust, and the Historic American Buildings Survey. The St. Mary's City Commission conducted a survey of southern Maryland, documenting with HABS drawings, photographs, and archival research scores of rural buildings dating from the mid-nineteenth century or earlier. HABS received the original drawings and the local and state organizations retained copies. Similarly, past neglect of agricultural buildings has led the Colonial Williamsburg Foundation and a private group of concerned field surveyors to record threatened farm buildings in the Chesapeake region.[6] Under cooperative agreements, materials gathered by organizations such as these can be deposited with HABS. With proper encouragement HABS has the opportunity to become, in its next fifty years, an essential collection for the study of vernacular building in America.

Recording the Work of an Architect: Frank Lloyd Wright

by

DAVID G. DE LONG

Studies of individual genius are fundamental to history. During the past decade, architectural historians have focused increasingly on Frank Lloyd Wright (1867–1959), and the astonishing number of books and articles now appearing have led at least one historian to characterize their production as a veritable cottage industry.[1] Such attention seems deserved, however, for the sort of ideas that architectural historians rightfully seek are abundant in Wright's work, and the clarification of these ideas through scholarly analysis is of real importance to the field. Probably no American architect has claimed the term genius more aggressively than Wright, nor have any yet appeared that deserve it more.

In accord with its underlying objectives, the Historic American Buildings Survey does not constitute a major archive of any single architect. Yet the manner in which individual architects are represented in the Survey can be informative. Thus a review of materials relating to Wright helps define his place in American architecture, for it illustrates selected examples in an appropriate geographical and chronological sequence, balanced by the work of his contemporaries as well as his precursors and followers.[2] Moreover, the neutrality of the Survey's presentation can reveal unique qualities to the discerning eye. Wright and his assistants produced drawings that were understandably sympathetic to the designs themselves, for, as most architects, they adjusted conventions and varied drawing techniques to enhance and even exaggerate significant aspects of their proposals. During the early years of the Historic American Buildings Survey, drawing conventions were sometimes similarly adjusted, but at that time Wright's work was not regarded as sufficiently historic to merit inclusion. During the postwar years, when selected examples by Wright were recorded, drawing conventions specified by the Survey were imposed without compromise, reducing buildings throughout the Survey to a common denominator.

A comparison of two plans for the same building illustrates the dilemma. For the famous Wasmuth edition of 1910, Wright supplied a plan of Unity Temple, 1906–7, that subtly revealed the complex levels and screening elements defining its revolutionary space (fig. 2). Partly this was achieved through intelligent complication of ordinary methods of representation. By contrast, the standardized plan in the Survey omits clear reference to split levels or to

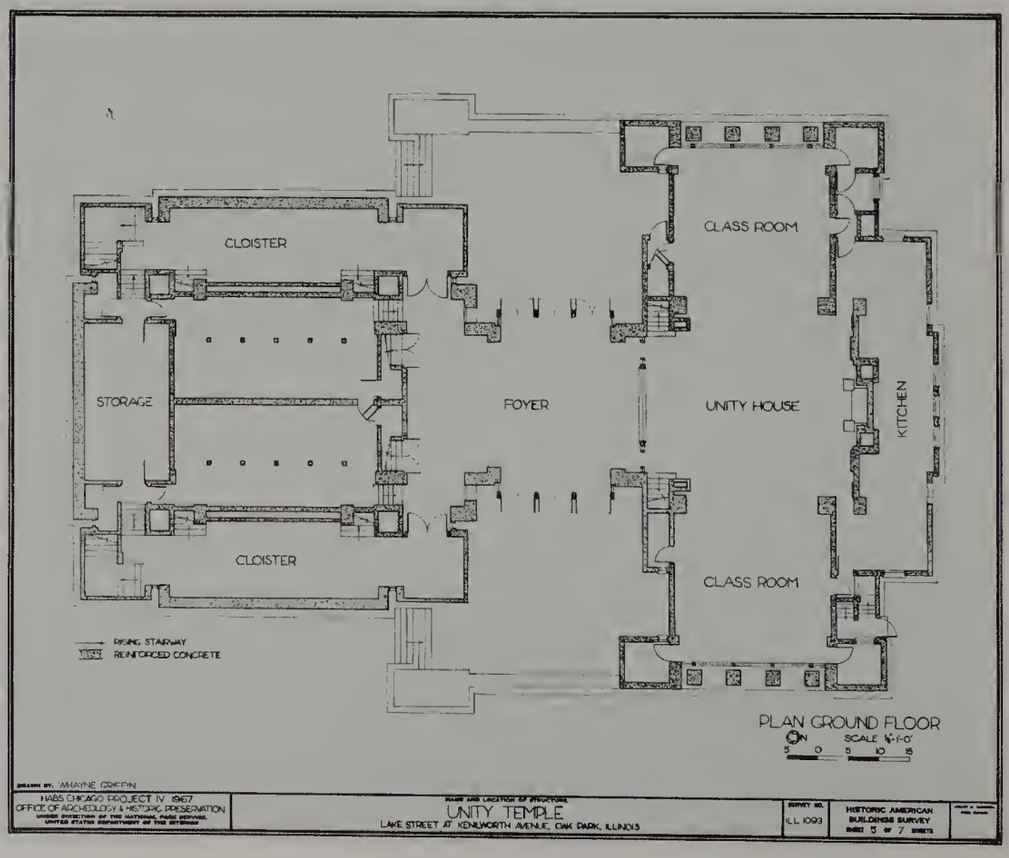

Figure 3 Frank Lloyd Wright, Unity Temple, Oak Park, Illinois, 1906-7. Plan of lower levels. Somewhat confusingly, though in accord with the standardized convention specified by the Historic American Buildings Survey, the foyer here is shown adjacent to the level below the sanctuary, obscuring the sense of spatial connection Wright effected. patterns of walls, piers, windows, and skylights. The building is accurately recorded, yet to render the walls of the sanctuary without their essential openings, to show the foyer with the lower level of the sanctuary (fig. 3) rather than the main floor, and to portray the building without reference to its site is to detract from the very meaning of that which is being shown. Comparisons between elevations and sections reveal similar differences, and in every case it can be argued that however insensitive such drawings are to the buildings themselves, the standardized conventions specified by the Survey facilitate orderly study. Photographs of Wright's buildings in the Survey are also meant to record rather than enhance, and many are equally unappealing. That any work can survive such cold portrayal is a testament to its strength.

The selection of Wright's buildings in the Survey is somewhat uneven, with an emphasis on the earlier work. Yet each of his major periods is represented by at least one example, as will be shown.[3] Between 1887 and 1893, while working for Dankmar Adler (1844–1900) and Louis H. Sullivan (1856–1924), Wright apparently designed around 25 buildings, of which some 20 were built.[4] The HABS materials include three independent commissions of 1892—the Blossom, Harlan, and McArthur houses—as well as two designs from the Adler and Sullivan office that are sometimes credited to Wright: Sullivan's house in Mississippi, 1890, and the Charnley house, 1891.[5] Whatever Wright's role in these two designs, themes apparent in his later and fully independent work can be sensed. The T-shaped plan of the Sullivan house, for instance, seems premonitory of Wright's River Forest Golf Club, 1895.

Other recorded examples by Adler and Sullivan in which Wright's role is assumed to have been more restricted suggest origins of certain attitudes and motifs that Wright later developed on his own. Thus the detail of Adler and Sullivan's Schiller Building, 1891–92, can be compared to an entrance detail of Wright's Francis Apartments, 1895–96 (figs. 1, 4). Wright's involvement with both may explain their similarities. Yet Wright's belief in ornament as essential to meaningful architecture

Figure 5 Frank Lloyd Wright, Francis Apartments, Chicago, 1895–96. View toward the entrance court. Like Sullivan, Wright used bands of geometric ornament to emphasize selected areas of a building. and his early use of geometric ornamental bands to emphasize selected wall areas (fig. 5) derive clearly from Sullivan. Earlier examples by Adler and Sullivan document Sullivan's own development of ornamental as well as other architectural themes and suggest a fuller genealogy of Wright's work.[6] Details of the exposed truss in the Hammond Library, 1882 (fig. 6), parallel many contemporary examples, such as those seen in work by Frank Furness (1839–1912), for whom Sullivan worked briefly in 1873. Both interior and exterior details by Wright also suggest a sympathy to nineteenth-century French rationalism, as did comparable work by Furness (fig. 7). Such ties were more than coincidental: Sullivan had studied in Paris at the École des Beaux-Arts and so had Furness's teacher, Richard Morris Hunt (1827–1895).[7]

Wright's design ability developed rapidly between 1893 and 1901, when he achieved results of profound significance. During these first eight years of independent practice he designed over 50 buildings, of which more than 35 were built. Five are included in the Survey: in addition to the Francis Apartments, they are the Winslow house, 1893; Francisco Terrace, 1895; the E. C. Waller Apartments, 1895; and the Heller house, 1897. Missing are key examples of 1900 and 1901, as are major examples of the next three years, such as the now-threatened Ward W. Willits house, 1902. Yet even the few included demonstrate his early talent, as apparent in the Winslow house, his first independent commission after leaving Adler and Sullivan's office. The plans (fig. 20) are not unconventional in themselves and contain such elements as a formal entrance hall with related alcove and fireplace (fig. 8), often combined by other architects in these years. Similar entrance halls recorded in Chicago include the Lathrop house, 1891–93, by Charles F. McKim (1847–1909), William R. Mead (1846–1928), and Stanford White (1853–1906) and the Dewes house by Adolf Cudell and Arthur Hercz, 1894–96. Distinct differences can be seen, however, in the architects' handling of these similar spaces. The earlier, assured manner of classical elements in the Lathrop House (fig. 9) reflects the skill of its New York architects, acknowledged leaders of the Academic Reaction, just as the slightly later and highly decorative combination of classical elements in the Dewes house (fig. 10) illustrates a local and more exuberant expression of talent. Both define space as conventionally as do the plans of which they are a part. In the Winslow house, classical elements are treated more abstractly, visually reduced in scale by the continuous entablature that emphasizes a wholly different conception of interior space. Moreover, for Wright the fireplace and its related elements of intimate enclosure came to symbolize aspects of family and place that gave it special prominence in his designs.[8] Even at this early date, Wright was moving in a different direction.

Some of Wright's most significant achievements were realized during the years of his early maturity between 1901 and 1910, when he designed more than 135 buildings, of which some 90 were built. In these the promise of earlier work is fulfilled, and in many he had the welcomed opportunity to design all components of a building, including such elements as furniture, lighting fixtures, and patterned windows. Drawings and photographs for the Robie house, 1908–10 (figs. 11, 19) illustrate these significant components of Wright's vision, and suggest the fully integrated effect he sought. Eleven buildings from this period are represented in the HABS materials, including, beside Unity Temple and the Robie house, the Darwin D. Martin house, 1904; the E-Z Polish Factory, 1905; alterations to the Rookery Building lobby, 1905; the W. A. Glasner house, 1905; the Boynton house, 1908; the May house, 1909; the Steffens house, 1909; and the Park Inn and City National Bank, 1909–10. Several are accompanied by pages of written information, and although these vary greatly in quality, some yield facts of real use. For the Martin house, this information lists drawings and other archival materials accessible in Buffalo. For the Robie house, it includes a copy of the builder's ledger sheets. Both sets of data sheets include names of contractors, references to property records, and a basic bibliography, as do most of the newer data sheets in the archive.

From 1910 through 1914, when his private life was in a state of tumultuous upheaval, Wright designed around 50 buildings, of which about 20 were actually constructed.[9] The HABS materials include one example:

Figure 15 Frank Lloyd Wright, Loren B. Pope house, Falls Church, Virginia, 1940. Exterior view. Photograph by Jack E. Boucher, 1964. (HABS VA–638, HABS VA, 30–FALCH, 2–4)

the Ziegler house, 1910. Its construction unsupervised by Wright and undistinctive except for its Kentucky location, the Ziegler house does little to suggest advances signaled by such examples as Taliesin, 1911; the Coonley playhouse, 1912; and Midway Gardens, 1913–14. The first two have been radically altered, however, and the last demolished.

From 1915 through 1927, while Wright sought stability in his private life, he designed about 75 buildings of which some 35 or 40 were built. The four recorded in the HABS materials are the Bach house, 1915; the Bogk house, 1916–17; Hollyhock House, 1917–21; and Residence "A" at Hollyhock House, 1920–21. The Bach and Bogk houses show Wright's tendency in these years to design abstractly cubic forms, a tendency that infused details with sharpened clarity (figs. 12, 13). Hollyhock House (fig. 14) reflects a determined move from his earlier vocabulary, a shift stimulated by new clients and distant sites, and one that led to such exceptional projects as San Marcos-in-the-Desert, 1927. Data sheets compiled for Hollyhock House in 1965 offered clear explanations of its complex construction that have only recently been published.[10]

Some of Wright's most important works were realized during the last thirty years of his life, when he received a volume of commissions more commensurate with his talent. He designed more than 100 buildings between 1928 and the beginning of American involvement in World War II, of which some 50 were built, and from 1941 until his death in 1959 he designed close to 400, of which more than 150 were built. These included major examples of public and institutional buildings, partly fulfilling a potential that had too infrequently been tapped. Although Wright's larger designs of the period are not yet included in the Survey, three small houses are: the Pope house, 1940; the Walter house, 1949–50; and the Trier house, 1958–59. These lack the impressive scale of his grander commissions, but they do illustrate attitudes that consistently informed his career. Thus his concern for appropriately expressive ornament shows in the Pope house (figs. 15, 16) as clearly as in the Francis Apartments (figs. 4, 5), though in the later example pattern was more a function of light than mass.[11]

It is perhaps in the indication of Wright's legacy that the Survey more appropriately excels. More than thirty architects have so far been identified as members of the Prairie School; all practiced in the Chicago area in the early decades of the twentieth century and all were heavily indebted to Wright.[12] Twelve of them are represented in the Survey. As the documents show, these architects focused on the more observable features of Wright's work as a point of departure. The vocabulary they reinforced came to have a reassuring consistency. Produced without benefit of genius, such examples suggest how abstract principles can be reduced to a repeatable formula that characterizes a stylistic manner. The results could be appealing, as in the Babson stable and service buildings by William Gray Purcell (1880–1965) and George Elmslie (1871–1952), 1915–16 (figs. 17, 18).

Wright's influence, coupled with that of his immediate colleagues, was not restricted to the Chicago area or to known architects, as documents in the Library of Congress show. An anonymous hotel lobby in Texas (fig. 21) illustrates one of many examples. To chart such influence is essential in the measure of genius, and in this regard the Historic American Buildings Survey collections will surely prove a major resource.

HABS at an Awkward Age: The 1960s and 1970s

by

ROBERT BRUEGMANN

At age fifty the Historic American Buildings Survey may be on the verge of outgrowing a difficult adolescence. Born into a world in which architects were still interested in fanlight details for new Colonial houses, HABS found itself after the Second World War in an age of steel and glass high-rise buildings. Despite a good many problems in the 1960s and 1970s, HABS has survived that period, and there are signs that it may enjoy a vigorous future. What follows are some observations on HABS in its awkward age.[1]

What HABS achieved in the 1930s was remarkable. In a few short years, a group of dedicated professionals turned out an astonishing quantity of useful and attractive drawings.[2] For the subsequent history of the Survey, however, one thing that did not happen is perhaps most interesting. What did not happen was a debate about the purpose or the technical means of recording historic buildings. This was taken for granted because the measured drawing was already so familiar to almost every architect.

What the HABS founders had in mind were drawings like those published in the White Pine monograph series in the 1920s. These crisp drawings of early American frame buildings were only the best known examples of this kind of recording activity (fig. 1). Indeed, the late 1920s and early 1930s saw a large number of projects at a local level very similar to what would later be proposed for HABS at the national level. So common had this kind of recording activity become, that John O'Neill, Park Service coordinator of HABS, could write in a report of 1930: "This report assumes that the basic principle, the techniques and the utility of measured records of architectural monuments are already established through many years of experience in many countries."[3]

The White Pine and other survey drawings had two major direct precedents. One was the builder's guides or "pattern books" published in Britain and America in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Written to illustrate "correct" construction techniques and ornamental details, these books contained engraved plates as illustrations. They

This design was adapted from an eighteenth-century cupola in Chester, Pennsylvania, to provide practicing architects with wood details appropriate for new work. It clearly shows how much the study and adaptation of old buildings were part of current architectural practice in the years immediately before the birth of the Survey. (LC–USZ62–83829)

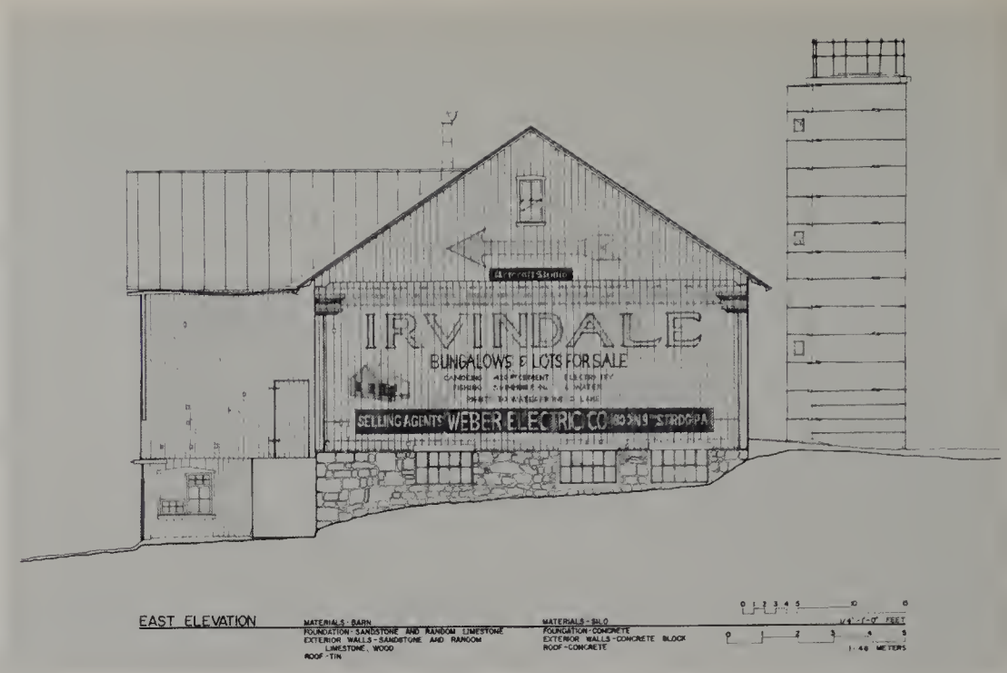

Figure 2 Joseph Conrad Farm (Miller's Farm), Mt. Pleasant vicinity, Pennsylvania Township, Berks County, Pennsylvania. Although many HABS drawings of the 1960s and 1970s are somewhat mechanical and dull, these decades did see the unexpected development of a kind of virtuoso fine-line drafting. This drawing of the Conrad Farm barn by Perry Benson is one of the most extraordinary examples. (HABS PA–260–B, sheet 4 of 5 of 10 sheets)

Figure 3 "Fragments antiques à Rome." The classic nineteenth-century volume of historical drawings shows the elaborate compositions and use of shading that gave drawings of the period an extremely painterly quality. This kind of composition, although often simplified, was the model for most American early twentieth-century measured drawings, and suggestions of it survive today, especially in the title sheets of some HABS drawing sets. Reconstruction drawing by G. Ancelet, from H. d'Espouy, Monuments antiques relevés et restaurés par les architectes pensionnaires de l'Académie de France à Rome (Paris, 1890). (LC–USZ62–83828) were extensively used by the carpenters and masons who designed and built America's Colonial buildings. The other major precedent was the archaeology project of the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris, the foremost architectural school of the time and the dominant influence on American architectural education. The product of this classroom exercise was a series of intricate sheets with plans, elevations, details, ornamental text, and decorative devices appropriate to the structure being measured (figs. 3, 4).

Two crucial, but often overlooked aspects of this kind of drawing must be considered to understand the founders' intentions. First, the measuring and drawing of a Corinthian capital or chair rail molding was thought to have much the same value for architects as the copying of masterpieces in the museum by art students. Repeated over and over, the details and proportions became second nature just as the major and minor scales would be to music students.

Second, measured drawings, besides their stated purpose of recording, almost always carried implicit polemical content. For example, the extensive sheets of drawings of the monuments of classical antiquity prepared by Renaissance architects were part of an attempt to break with medieval traditions and to reinstitute supposedly correct architectural principles based on an exhaustive comparative study of the remains of the best ancient buildings. Likewise in this country in the early years of the twentieth century, the study of Colonial architecture was thought to be a way of returning to simplicity and order after the unrestrained exuberance of the late nineteenth century. This was definitely the spirit in which HABS was founded, although by the 1930s the range had

Figure 4 "Un Puits dans le cloître de St.-Jean d'Angers." This elaborate sheet, containing a plan, two elevations, and a perspective of a well in a church at Angers, France, is an excellent example of the virtuoso treatment of measured drawings that American students learned at the École de Beaux-Arts and brought back to schools of architecture in this country. It is obvious that the design of the sheet was at least as important as the information conveyed. Drawing by Albert G. Nash, an American student of Pascal at the École des Beaux-Arts, Paris. been broadened to include buildings from the seventeenth through the early nineteenth centuries.

Indeed it seems clear that the HABS pioneers and many architects thought of the drawings done by the Historic American Buildings Survey as a kind of pattern book. Professional architectural magazines, notably Architectural Forum, started to reproduce HABS drawings to provide details for practicing architects exactly in the same way the White Pine series had done (fig. 7). In fact it is often difficult, leafing through the pages of these magazines, to distinguish at first glance between working drawings for new buildings of the period and HABS measured drawings.

The program set out by Charles E. Peterson in his memo was a logical and comprehensive one. He wrote that the buildings recorded should provide "an almost complete resume of the builder's art," including not only houses and churches but bridges, forts, shops, log cabins, ghost towns, pueblos, and others. Altogether it was an extremely forward-looking list for the time. His intention was to create a complete taxonomy of American building types and styles, illustrated by the best preserved and most intact examples.[4]

Despite the temporary nature of the program, the Survey's founders had great ambitions. They fully believed they could achieve a comprehensive record. John O'Neill estimated in 1938 that there were some fourteen thousand prime important structures that should be recorded and that already seventy-five hundred had been recorded in photographs and twenty-eight hundred in drawings. The early HABS staff members planned to do a major book in which HABS drawings would document the whole development of American architecture.[5] In addition to the buildings that were measured, an inventory was set up that would record many more structures. According to the 1935 instruction sheets, "Specifications for the Measurement and Recording of Historic American Buildings and Structural Remains," "it is proposed to continue the indexing of historic American architecture until a complete catalog of all important

This plan of the Bennett house garden was drawn in 1943-44 by Frank Chouteau Brown, longtime head of the Survey's New England operations. Brown apparently took measurements provided by others and created a fanciful composition with a plan in the center bordered on two sides by sections in one case extending beyond the sheet's border lines. This sheet shows the kind of freedom enjoyed by HABS draftsmen in the 1930s. A drawing of the same subject in the 1970s would probably have been clearer but less interesting in appearance. (HABS MASS–608, sheet 15 of 15 sheets) structures is available in the Library of Congress." It was a very bold and comprehensive vision.

Set up as a strictly temporary relief measure, the Survey operated in a somewhat irregular fashion with a variety of funding sources through the 1930s, but by the time America entered World War II it had become largely inoperative. After the war the kind of recording HABS started was continued by Peterson at the Park Service's Independence Hall in Philadelphia, but it was not until 1957 that HABS itself was reinstituted. It was a real tribute to its founders that HABS was revived, apparently the only survivor among all of the federal government's federal relief programs.

When the Survey did resume operations, it took up almost exactly where it had left off in the 1930s. The only really substantial change in the operation was the use of student draftsmen instead of unemployed architects on the recording teams. The rest of the world had changed dramatically, however.

First, the total number of buildings considered historic skyrocketed as first the late nineteenth and then the early twentieth century were considered worthy of serious attention. To keep up with changing ideas about architectural history, the cut-off date for recording was moved from 1860 to 1900 and finally to a sliding scale that would include buildings more than fifty years old. The number of potential structures increased correspondingly, creating instant problems.

As early as the 1950s HABS already estimated that there were over three million historic structures. In 1975 the Survey's chief estimated that, at an average cost of $2,000–3,500 per structure, it would take over a hundred years at the current pace just to measure the twelve thousand buildings on the National Register, only a fraction of the country's historic buildings. Since then both the drawing cost and the number of buildings on the Register have continued to rise much faster than the HABS budget, even in the era when that budget was increasing.[6] As if all this were not enough, HABS was challenged as never before by the volume of demolition unleashed by urban renewal, highway construction, and the reconstruction of large areas of America's cities.

In the face of these dramatic changes, HABS did, over the next two decades, try to bring itself into line with the demands of the postwar years. This is most immediately noticeable in HABS drawings. By the 1960s these had become cut off from the world of architectural practice. By then students in schools of architecture no longer learned how to draw Corinthian capitals with shades and shadows. Spare hard-line drawings with stenciled letters replaced the more elaborate rendered plans and perspectives with watercolor washes and elegant hand lettering. For the average student draftsman the whole art of the measured drawing became virtually unknown as fanlights and egg-and-dart moldings were replaced by steel spandrel panels and neoprene window gaskets. No longer could HABS rely on previous training to ensure high quality and uniformity.

HABS instituted a number of new procedures to deal with this situation. To some extent they worked, and the drawings of the 1960s and 1970s are, for the most part, clear and uniform in treatment. The same policies had the unfortunate side effect of making many of them dry and academic. In the 1930s the instruction sheets sent out to teams were quite modest and only laid down the most basic procedures. Even these were often disregarded. One of the most common practices of the 1930s was the reconstruction drawing. Despite instructions to avoid conjectural restorations, there were a surprising number of sheets based on fuzzy old photographs or, in some cases, on nothing more than old sketches and written descriptions. This was probably done because many of the draftsmen felt so familiar with the construction and details of that period that they felt these drawings could be completely plausible even if not necessarily correct.

After the war, on the other hand, practice became much more codified. Graphic techniques were standardized. Mechanical lettering replaced hand lettering, and polyester was substituted for paper. The instruction booklets became more specific. Harley J. McKee's Recording Historic Buildings, which appeared in 1950, was intended as a summary of HABS procedures. All of these things made HABS records more uniform and probably more accurate, but this was done at the expense of the spontaneity and invention which made the 1930s sheets so compelling. Comparing some sheets prepared for Boscobel Plantation in the early 1930s, before HABS was inaugurated, with sheets made by Columbia University students for HABS in 1977 to show currently existing conditions immediately demonstrates how mechanical the new sheets can be. Even begging for a moment the question of why these sheets were needed at all, it is apparent that the information is there but the grace of the old drawings has disappeared (figs. 8, 9).

If in the 1930s the two-fold goal of producing beautiful drawings and creating meticulous records was sometimes accomplished by slighting the latter aspect, many of the drawings of the 1960s and 1970s err decidedly on the other side. The late 1970s did see one curious attempt to resolve this problem. Perhaps to compensate for the loss of the tapestry-like ornamental appearance that occurred when many of the notes, measurements, molding profiles, and other details were left off drawings, a new interest in virtuoso, fine-line drafting developed. Used primarily for elevations, it turned into a highly developed style as good examples from previous years were sent out to each new set of summer teams (figs. 2, 10). Unfortunately, where earlier drawings had been done primarily with heavy line weights so they could be easily reproduced, the HABS drawings of the 1970s with their exquisite four-aught pen lines—and occasionally even diluted ink—often could not be reproduced at small scale without losing most of the detail, and it was only in reproduction that most people ever saw them.

Much more serious were the conceptual problems brought about by the expanded activities of the Survey. In the 1930s HABS drawings proved a perfect vehicle for recording small buildings in detail, showing the small variations which differentiated one period from the next and one region from another. When the scale of the building increased dramatically, HABS did introduce a larger sheet size, but this did not solve the basic problems. For an eighteenth-century house, five or six drawings, including a full set of elevations, plans, and sections as well as a few details, could record a building quite well. With a six-story late nineteenth-century Romanesque-style courthouse taking up a city block, many more sheets were needed just to record the architectural features, forgetting for a moment the structural, electrical, heating, and ventilating systems as well as the sculptural and painted decorations that would have to be documented to give an adequate idea of such a structure. The standard drawing set that once satisfied most of the uses to which HABS drawings might be put was no longer adequate.

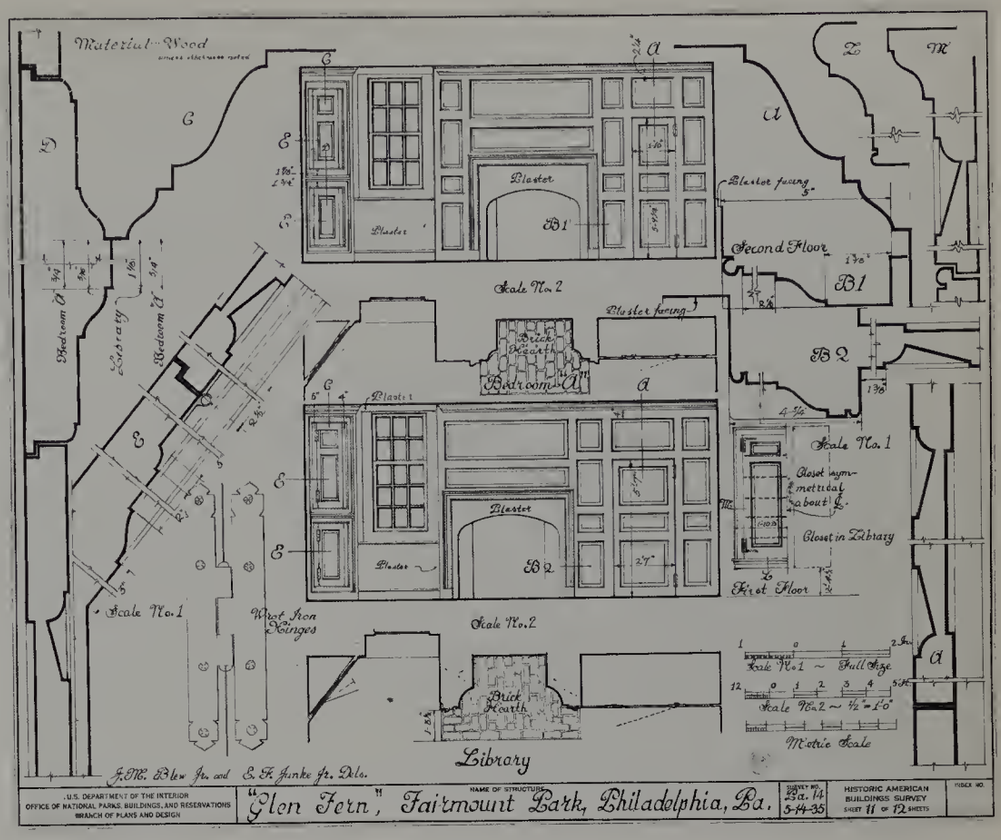

Figure 10 Glen Fern, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. This sheet was reproduced in the 1935 "Specifications for the Measurement and Recording of Historic American Buildings and Structural Remains" and clearly shows the ornamental tapestrylike appearance created by the inclusion of numerous moulding profiles, details, and notes. Measured drawing by J. M. Blew, Jr., and E. F. Janke, Jr. (HABS PA–14, sheet 11 of 12 sheets)

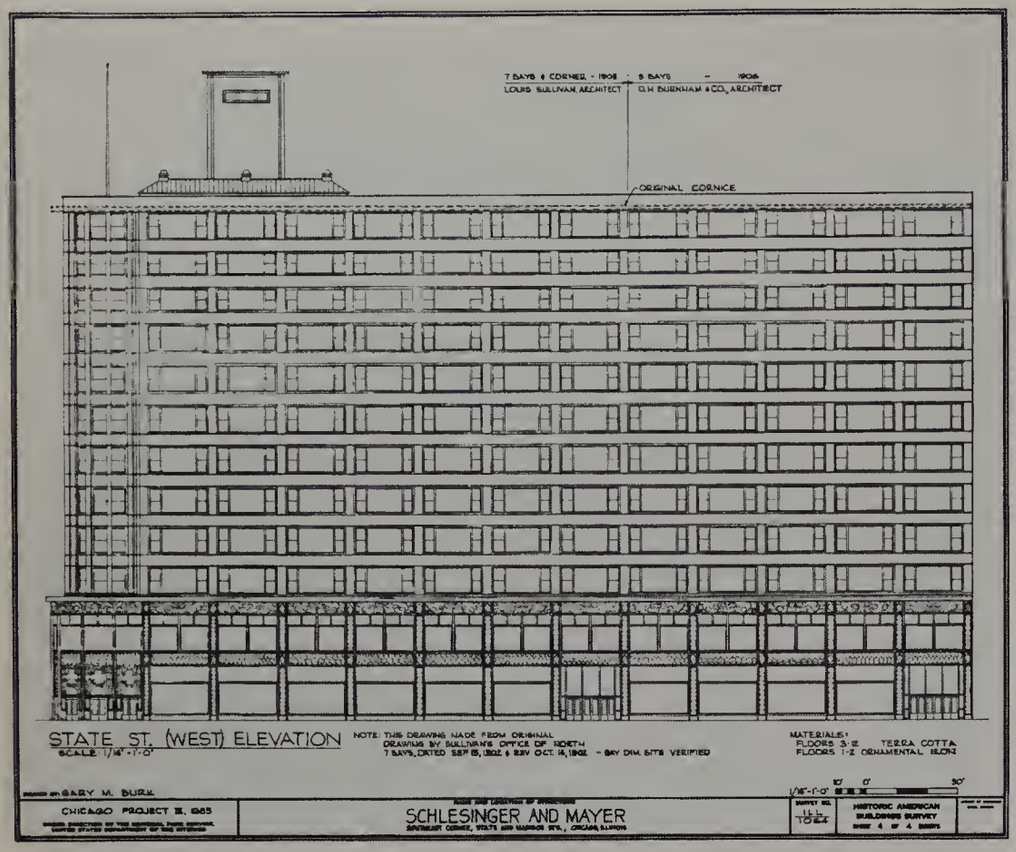

Figure 11 Schlesinger and Mayer, Chicago, Illinois. This elevation illustrates typical problems the Historic American Buildings Survey encountered in recording large late nineteenth-and early twentieth-century buildings. According to a note on the sheet, this drawing was redrawn from a Sullivan drawing of 1902 with the bay dimensions verified on the site. It would have been cheaper and more useful to have photocopied the original drawing. Researchers would then have had an authentic document. Here—because the HABS team decided to alter the drawing to make it reflect conditions in 1965 but did not do this consistently and did not make enough notes to explain what they did— the result is a drawing that shows neither Sullivan's original intention nor the condition of the building at a given time in the past. Measured drawing by Gary M. Burk. (HABS ILL–1064, sheet 4 of 4 sheets)

The attempt to record these larger, later structures ultimately led to more difficult problems still. Some of the most spectacular HABS drawings of the last two decades record in great detail the lavish ornament of great Second Empire and High Victorian Gothic piles that dot the American landscape. Many of their ornamental features were not handmade but were purchased by the square foot from lumber yards or supply stores. How ironic that these mass-produced details were now measured by hand and redrawn with the same loving care earlier given to the original creations of artisans and local craftsmen. Even more ironic, perhaps, is the spectacle of the HABS format—created by early twentieth-century architects who hated late nineteenth-century architecture and used their drawings as a means of propaganda against it—being used to record mansard roofs, cast-iron facades, and polychrome brick details.

A good example of the limitations of the HABS format can be found in the drawings of Louis Sullivan's famous Carson-Pirie-Scott Store (labeled on the drawings only with the store's original name, Schlesinger and Mayer, and not with the name by which it is now universally known) (fig. 11). Although the historical portion of this survey, by Larry J. Homolka, succeeds in being quite useful, despite the straitjacket outline imposed on the material, the drawings have little value. They were primarily traced from original Sullivan drawings but partially and inaccurately altered to show conditions in 1965. Because the draftsmen were obviously torn between reflecting the original intentions of the architect and showing the building as it then existed, they succeeded in doing neither. Instead the drawings show only a portion of the building, omitting without any note a large portion of the store on Wabash Avenue. They fail to distinguish between the dates of the various parts. Most damaging of all, even a casual glance at the building will reveal that the pier between the seven-bay Sullivan section of 1903 and the five-bay Burnham addition of 1906 is twice as wide as the others. No draftsman who was as interested in the actual building as he was in the drawing could have made such an error. What he did was simply extend Sullivan's drawing five more bays without even checking it against the actual building.

More subtle but equally misleading is the fact that the HABS drawings manage to show the structure as a simple rectangular solid with a completely open regular grid of columns in uninterrupted interior spaces punctuated by a regular grid of columns, the whole sheathed in a thin skin of smooth, flat terra-cotta. In other words, the drawings edit the building to make it conform to Modernist notions about it and fail to show it as it was and is: a complex, highly decorated structure with a large number of partitions, display installations, and other architectural features on the interior. How much less expensive and more useful this project would have been if the original drawings had simply been photocopied and the draftsmen sent to do something else.

Despite all the surface changes in the drawings, the one thing that did not change at HABS was the assumption that the HABS drawing was the primary vehicle for recording historic buildings. I feel that it has been this emphasis on the end product rather than on the purpose that has created difficulties. Large building complexes, for instance, had been recorded in the 1930s on magnificent sheets containing a wealth of information (fig. 14). As the use of complex sheets with notes declined, HABS relied more on simple site plans and street elevations (fig. 15). These often give little sense of the neighborhood, and for historical information the user must consult the historical reports. Even used in conjunction with historical reports, however, the format is limiting. It would be very difficult, for example, to record with a standard drawing set a brownstone district in New York or a planned suburban residential community. What is interesting in these cases is not a single building or even a row of buildings but the hundreds of variations on a more-or-less standard theme, the distribution of various building types throughout given eras in the past, and the modification of building types over the years. In cases like this, the drawings should take a distinctly secondary role and an extensive set of photographs, photographic copies of old views, insurance maps, and other maps, and a detailed historical report should be assembled, giving a much more useful package than a standard drawing set.

To its credit, HABS made a major effort to improve the historical portion of the Survey. In the 1930s, because the primary function of the Survey was to make drawings, because buildings surveyed were largely designed by anonymous builders, because few records existed for many Colonial structures, and because the founders and original employees of HABS were architects rather than trained historians, historical research took a distinctly minor position. In his 1933 memo, Charles Peterson wrote: "It is anticipated that the historical data incident to the buildings studied may be secured through local and state institutions and societies. Only the briefest resume of facts is necessary in each case and it does not seem necessary to build up an overhead for the purpose of getting data which is ordinarily obtainable gratis." After 1957 HABS did start routinely to employ historians on its summer teams, but since the teams needed to start measuring as soon as they arrived, the historians might not discover until too late that a full set of original drawings already existed for a building being measured, or that the building was not, as previously thought, the home of the local hero, or that indeed—in rare instances—HABS had already drawn it, or that the historical data were not housed at the remote site in Utah where the historian had been sent but at the National Archives in Washington.

The growing rift between the architect and historian also had an influence on HABS. The records produced

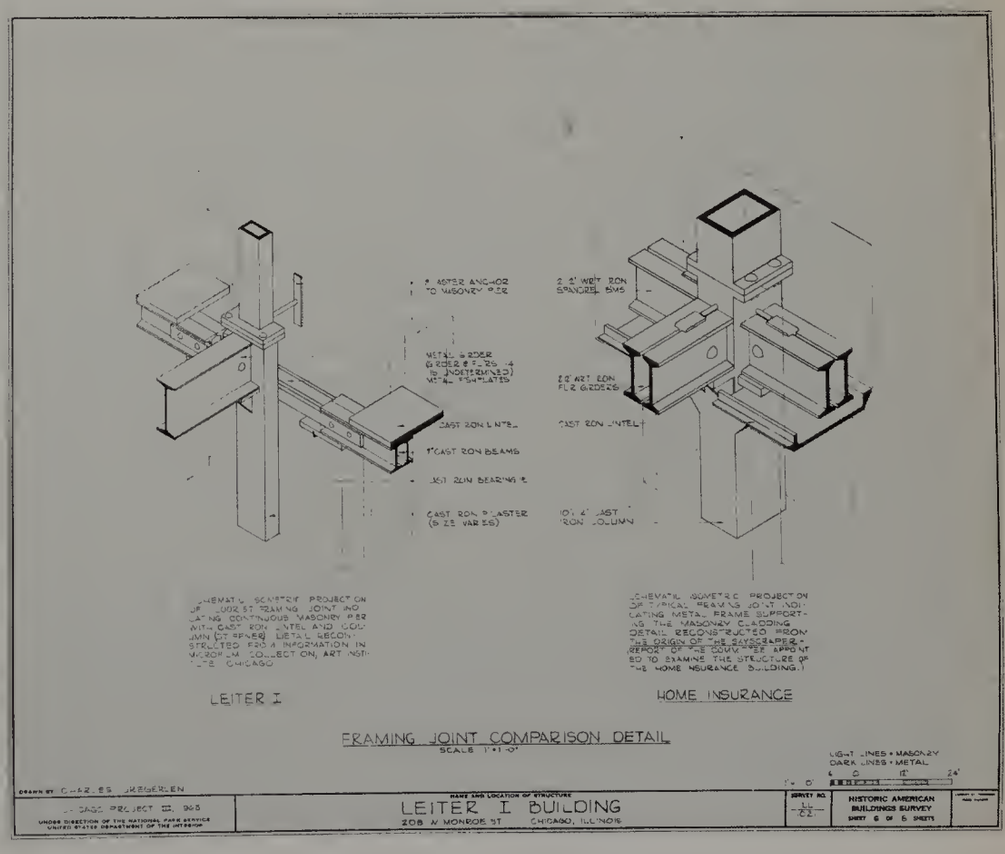

Figure 12 Framing joint comparison detail, Leiter I Building with Home Insurance Building, Chicago, Illinois. An interesting sheet that could have been of great value, this was unfortunately not done from the building itself but from drawings at the Chicago Art Institute. Moreover, the notes do not explain exactly what drawings were used. This is important to know if one is to judge the degree of misinterpretation one might expect to find in the drawing. In the end, the viewer has no way of knowing either how closely this follows original drawings or whether they actually reflected conditions in the building. Measured drawing by Charles Gregersen, 1965. (HABS ILL–1021, sheet 6 of 6 sheets)

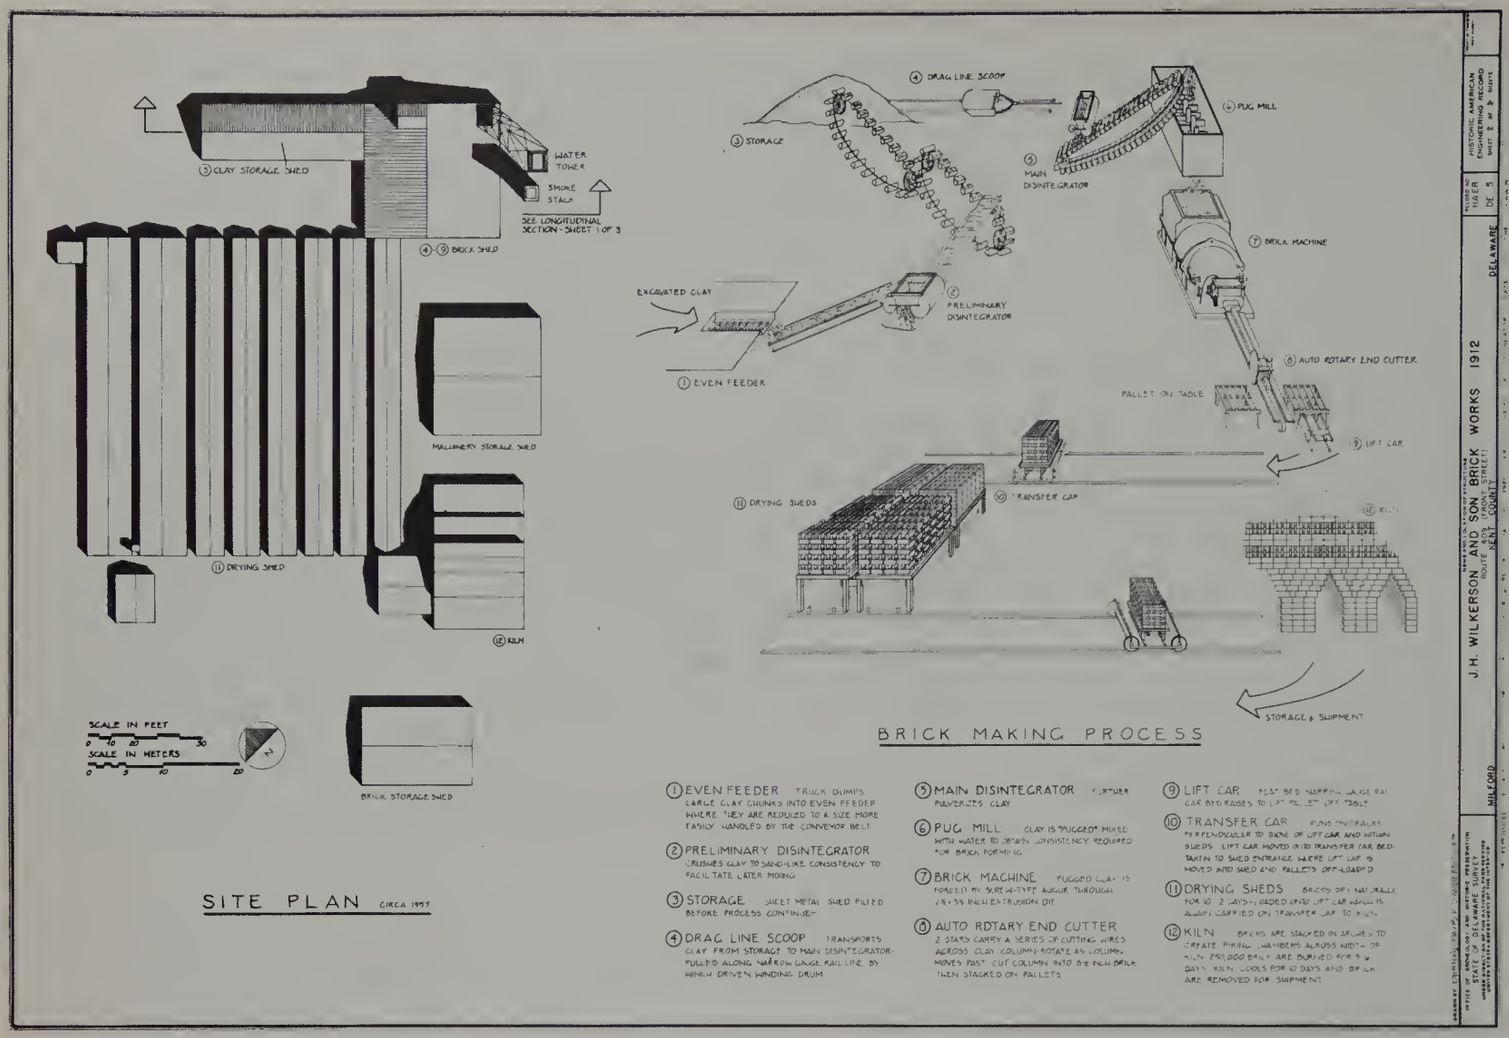

Figure 13 J. H. Wilkerson and Son Brick Works, Milford, Kent County, Delaware. Recognizing that the manufacturing or other processes that took place in the building were often more important than the structure itself, the Historic American Engineering Record pioneered a variety of inventive new recording methods. This drawing, showing the brickmaking process, goes well beyond traditional HABS practice. From its inception in 1969, HAER has been forced to do a good deal of experimentation to find formats that fit its own needs. (HAER DE–5, sheet 2 of 3 sheets) by HABS in the 1930s were of considerable importance in the rapidly developing field of American architectural history. Many of the most prominent historians were practicing architects closely affiliated with HABS. William G.Perry and Frank Chouteau Brown in Boston, Albert Simons in Charleston, Charles M. Stotz in Pittsburgh, Samuel Wilson, Jr., in New Orleans, Thomas Tallmadge and Earl Reed in Chicago, and Thomas Tileston Waterman in Virginia were all widely known for their research as well as their contributions to HABS.

The same cannot be said for the situation after 1957. By this time a new generation of architectural historians had emerged, and many of its most important members, like Henry-Russell Hitchcock, were not part of the network of historic architects that had created HABS. Many, in fact, were confirmed Modernists, hostile to the most basic principles that guided HABS. They were, moreover, no longer primarily interested in the anonymous craftsmen of the American colonies but in the great architects and complexes of the nineteenth and early twentieth century. There was usually not enough material in the HABS files to be really useful to the authors of major monographs on architects such as H. H. Richardson, Frank Lloyd Wright, or Louis Sullivan, and when it came to studying the works of enormous firms like McKim, Mead and White or Graham, Anderson, Probst and White, HABS couldn't even begin to provide a comprehensive record.

Part of the problem was that as the collection grew, access to the material became increasingly difficult. The Library of Congress shelflist system and other indexes were quite innovative when they were devised. The 1941 published catalog and the 1959 supplement also served their purpose. After 1959, however, it was decided, because of the size of the comprehensive catalog, that state catalogs should be issued. Some of these proved to be quite interesting. In many ways the most satisfactory of all was Richard Perrin's Wisconsin Architecture (Washington: National Park Service, 1965), the only catalog that reproduces enough drawings for someone to get a good idea of both the buildings and drawings (fig. 16). Perrin's publication is limited to single examples of early, mostly rural architecture, however. When the much more complex task of producing a catalog that included later buildings, large ensembles, and whole districts was attempted, the limitations of HABS documents created problems. In the most successful of these—for example Richard Webster's Philadelphia Preserved—what is the most useful comes not from the HABS materials themselves but from the author's essays and original research.

The state catalog system never really worked, however, because it created a patchwork quilt of information constantly falling further out-of-date.

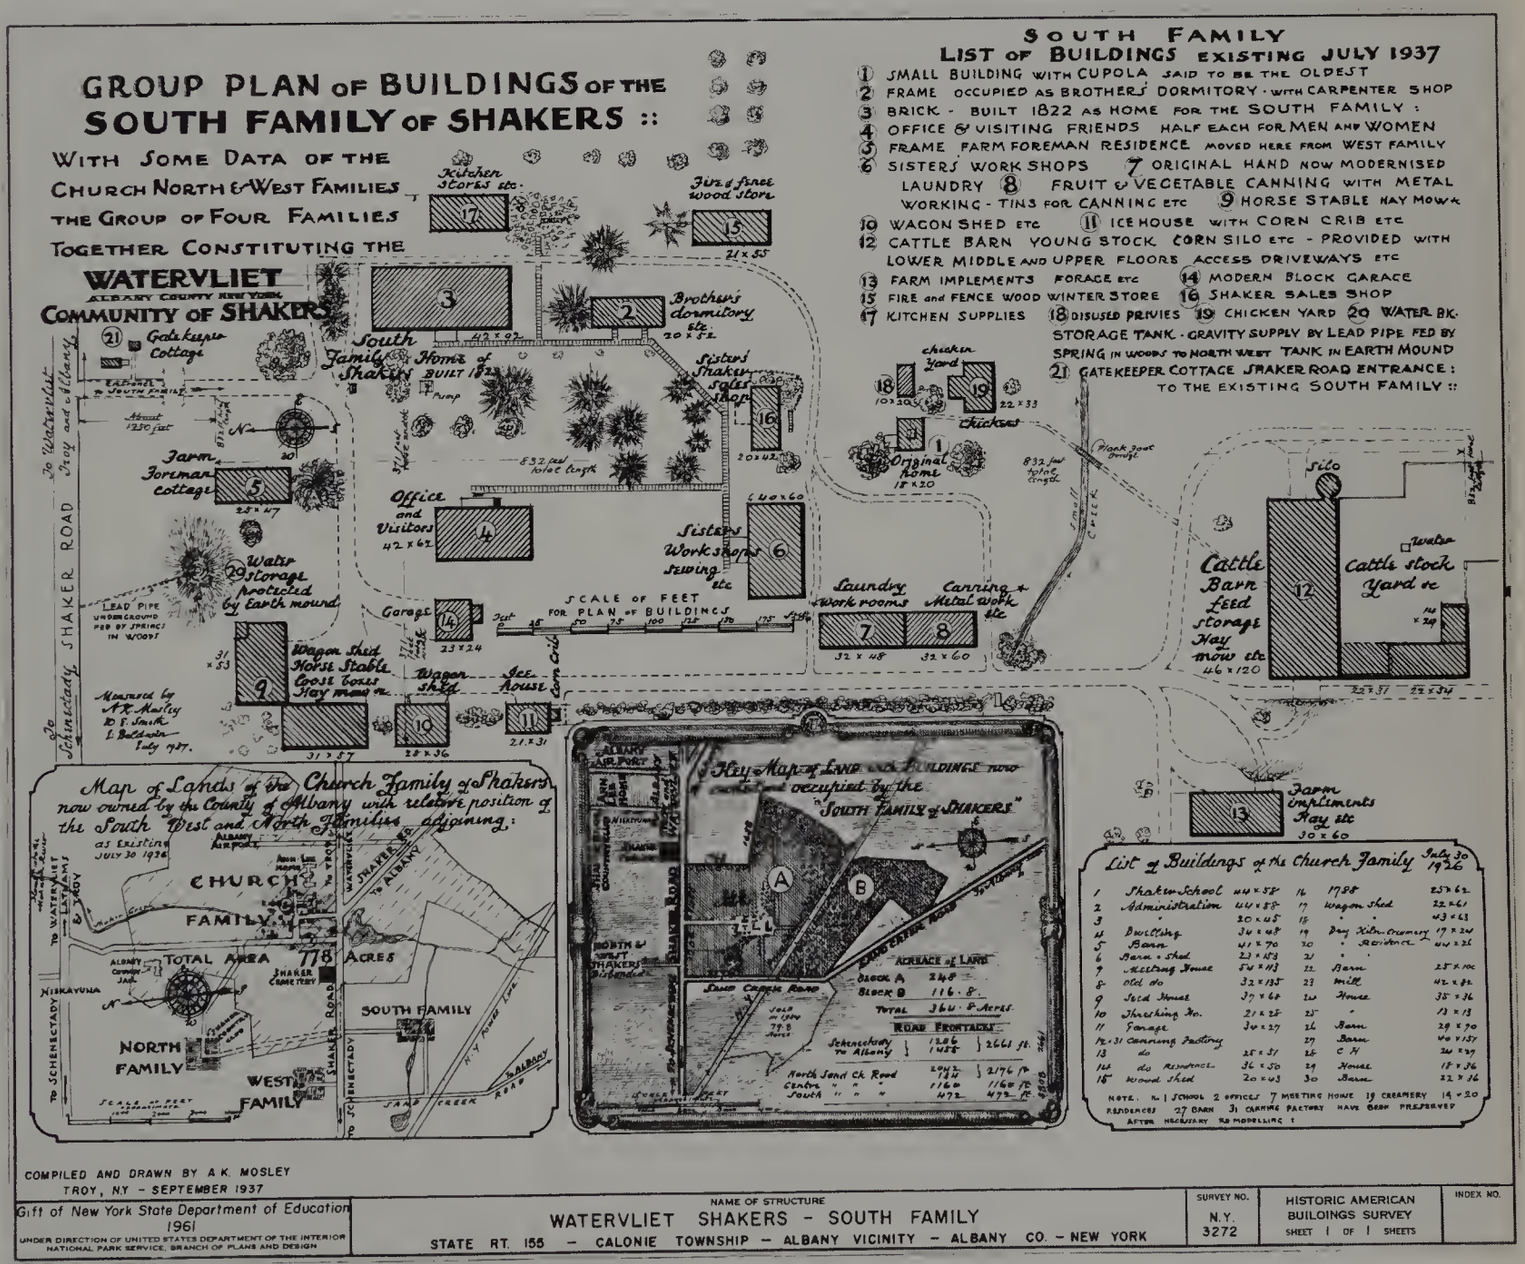

Figure 14 Watervliet Shakers—South Family, Albany vicinity, Albany County, New York. When large complexes were recorded in the 1930s, the sheets usually contained enough notes and other information to make them nearly sufficient in themselves as descriptions of the complexes. One can learn a great deal about this Shaker property simply by studying this single sheet, drawn in 1937. (HABS NY–3272, sheet 1 of 1 sheet)

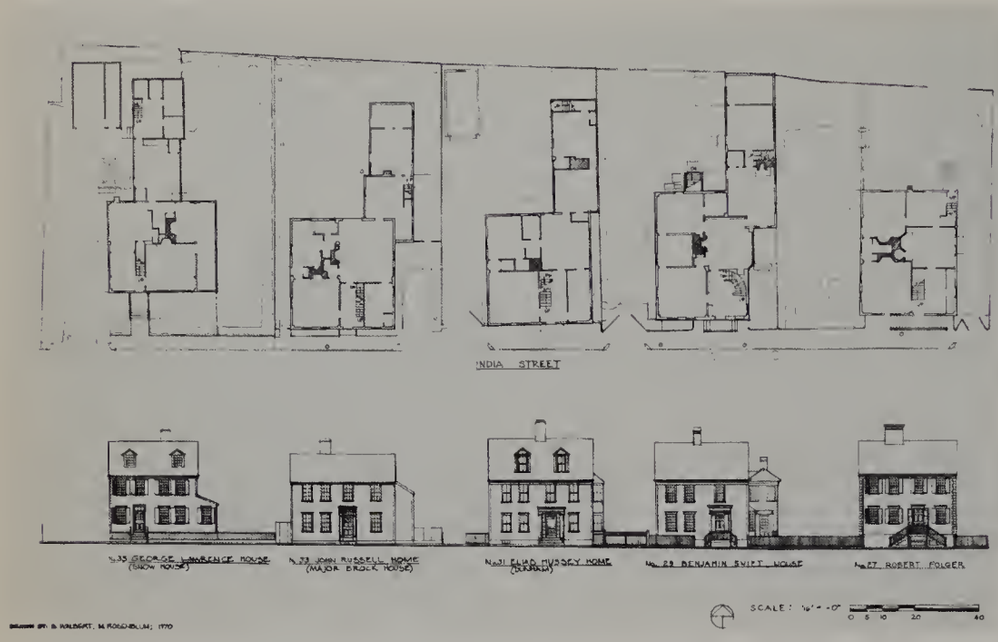

Figure 15 Neighborhood study, India Street, Nantucket, Massachusetts. One of the most comprehensive recording projects ever initiated using the HABS format has been under way for a number of years in Nantucket. Although this sheet is labeled "Neighborhood Study," in itself it gives very little information about the neighborhood. The viewer has no idea whether these are typical or extraordinary houses, when they were built, why they sit the way they do on their lots, or even what the rooms were used for. In the best cases, all is explained in accompanying historical reports. The style of drawing and the type and amount of information conveyed here contrast markedly with the sheets prepared in the 1930s. Measured drawing by E. Walbert and M. Rosenblum, 1970. (HABS MASS 1013, sheet 4 of 7 sheets)

Likewise the ambitious but somewhat ad hoc system of indexing worked out at the Library of Congress had definite limits. Clearly the only satisfactory solution was computerization, which is now under way.

Of all the problems facing HABS in its awkward years, the greatest was one of purpose. In the 1930s the goal was clear: to record the best examples of early American architecture. The means were well known to all HABS employees and there was likewise relatively little debate about which buildings should be recorded. The selection was largely left to the local chapters of the American Institute of Architects and to the regional HABS directors. In most cases these men already knew quite well the most important buildings in their area and, except at a few exceptional sites, the total number of intact examples was fairly limited. To create a comprehensive national inventory and then to photograph the major structures and document by recorded drawings the outstanding ones was a completely logical goal. HABS had made substantial progress along those lines by the end of the 1930s.

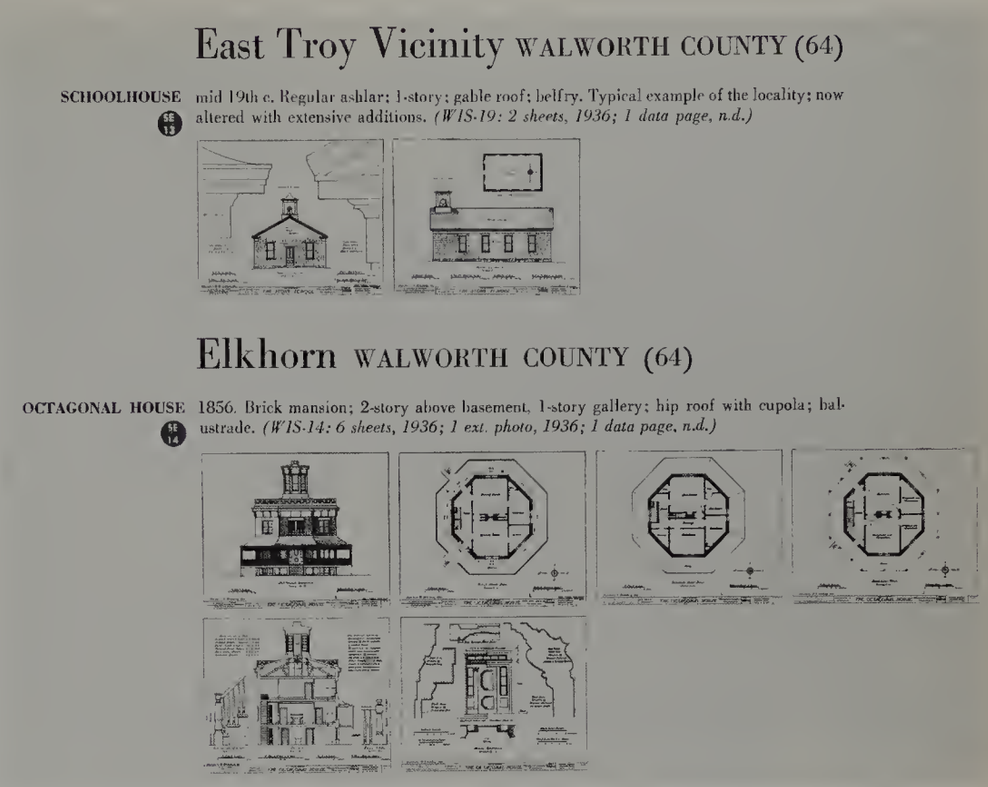

When the scale of preservation activity in general and the HABS operation itself increased dramatically after 1957, this concept was effectively lost. A new inventory form was devised and championed by Earl Reed, one of the program's early stalwarts. By the postwar years, however, there was no one left to work on the inventory. It appears that the AIA, which had spearheaded the earlier inventory project, had lost interest. The apparatus of the local advisors with wide discretionary powers had disappeared.

HABS itself certainly did not have the manpower. The inventory form was finally abandoned in 1972, its function supposedly to be taken over by the National Register and state surveys then under way. But among them the Register, the National Landmarks program, the National Trust, and state preservation offices have not created a national inventory. Instead there is an unfinished, often contradictory hodgepodge of inventories, surveys, and protection laws.

Compounding the difficulties HABS faced was the fact that funding levels dropped so low that the agency was obliged to go to outside sources to secure partial or full funding for most of its summer projects. Despite the Survey's justifiable pride in its ability to create partnerships with other agencies and with the private sector, this practice has intensified some of the program's basic problems. It is not difficult to see how the priorities of local sponsors might differ from those of the program as a whole. Some of the buildings recorded in the last few years are so insignificant that they hardly seem worthy of the immortality conferred by a single photograph let alone a full set of measured drawings.

For all of the reasons cited above, HABS might well have appeared a hopeless invalid a few years ago. The Survey, however, has managed to survive for fifty years, has given a small army of young architects and historians an invaluable educational experience, has produced some extraordinary drawings, and has won a large and loyal following unmatched by almost any other government agency. The HABS "alumni" today constitute an extraordinarily interesting group and include many of the pillars of the preservation movement. The importance of the camaraderie developed on these teams over the years cannot be overestimated. Moreover, drawings of historic architecture are once again of potential interest to practicing architects in a way they have not been for decades. The early HABS drawings and even many of more recent date now seem at least as important as period pieces of their own era as they are as documents about the buildings they record. In fact, one of the most appealing things about HABS today is its antique quality. Despite all the surface changes, it is still very much a product of the 1930s and is interesting in much the same way as one of the rare surviving rooms of architectural plaster casts at a museum. After years of neglect these casts are suddenly back in vogue not primarily as records of antique buildings or sculpture but as objects illuminating the era when they were made and admired. Admittedly this is probably not reason sufficient to galvanize the Park Service or Congress into tripling the budget of the Historic American Buildings Survey, but it does give the collection an even greater significance than it seemed to have several decades ago.

Recording Historic Buildings: New Philosophies, New Techniques, New Technologies

by

JOHN A. BURNS

Charles Peterson's memorandum of November 13, 1933, proposing the establishment of the Historic American Buildings Survey, included a recommendation that the Survey not document structures built after 1860. Aside from being a logical end point, the date determined the type and style of buildings that would dominate the Survey's early recording efforts. The recommendation implied that buildings should be at least seventy-three years old to be considered historic. It eliminated from consideration the huge number of buildings constructed in the last part of the nineteenth century.

Given these limitations, the body of buildings to be studied was relatively small, with a limited number of building types and materials of construction—in other words, manageable. The format designed for the documentation was correspondingly simple and straightforward. The drawing sheet size was roughly 60′-0″ × 80′-0″ at the common scale of ¼″ = 1′-0″, which allowed most pre-1860 buildings to fit comfortably within the borders. The drawing format was also horizontal: the need to document tall buildings was outside the scope of early HABS work.

Fifty years later, one finds a different set of circumstances. The labor-intensive nature of hand measuring and drafting, ideal for relief employment, is expensive. Following National Register criteria, buildings now come of age historically in just fifty years, so that now HABS is documenting buildings younger than itself. Census figures show that 25 percent of our extant building stock predates 1930, and probably only 5 percent predates 1860. Changes such as these have forced reassessment and adjustment in HABS methodology for documentation and will continue to do so. Expected changes in methodology over the next decade will be governed by the resources available to produce documentation, the actual building stock that has become historic in the last fifty years, and the available research materials on these buildings.

Given the greatly increased universe of buildings HABS is mandated to survey with only limited resources, it will, of necessity, become far more selective in recording historic buildings. Congress has directed that the Department of the Interior set national standards for architectural and engineering documentation. These HABS/HAER standards will be issued in 1983, the fiftieth anniversary year of the Historic American Buildings Survey. Two points that the standards will incorporate are worth noting. First, the kind and amount of documentation should be appropriate to the nature and significance of the building. Second, the documentation should concentrate on the features of a building which give it its significance. Measured drawings, for instance, are recommended only for nationally significant buildings. Fewer "complete" sets of drawings will be produced; photographs will be substituted for drawings whenever possible. The drawings that are produced will have more information packed into them: more given dimensions and annotations and denser sheet composition, similar to the drawings of the 1930s. The drawings will concentrate on features that cannot be adequately described in words or photographed. Fewer measured drawings will mean an increased dependence on photographs for graphic documentation. Sizing aids such as measuring sticks in photographs will be more common and so will rectified photographs.

Buildings constructed between 1860—the 1933 HABS cut-off date—and 1933—the current HABS cut-off date—will be the primary target for documentation in the next decade. These seven decades were a period of tremendous change in America and in the architectural profession. Early American buildings were designed and constructed based on empirical knowledge and traditions that have evolved over centuries. Structural systems were simple and mechanical systems rudimentary in all but the most

The original 19″ x 24″ HABS drawing format was not well-suited for documenting the large public and commercial buildings which became common in the late nineteenth century. A second format, 24″ x 36″ in size, was introduced in the late 1960s after several projects documenting early skyscrapers in Chicago proved the futility of using the smaller sheets to record large buildings. The original specifications for a historic building offer not just information about the specific building but insights about historic construction technology and practice, the cost and availability of materials, and trade and craft practices. Since the architect's specifications are a virtual instruction manual for assembling a building, they are an invaluable source of information. Arthur B. ADDENDUM TO
AUDITORIUM BUILDING
(ROOSEVELT UNIVERSITY)

THE RESEARCH AND DOCUMENTATION OF THE ENGINEERING SYSTEMS OF THE AUDITORIUM BUILDING WERE UNDERTAKEN BY THE NATIONAL ARCHITECTURAL AND ENGINEERING RECORD (NAER) IN COOPERATION WITH ROOSEVELT UNIVERSITY AND WITH FINANCIAL SUPPORT FROM THE GRAHAM FOUNDATION OF CHICAGO AND THE STATE OF ILLINOIS DEPARTMENT OF CONSERVATION. NAER'S PARTICIPATION WAS A JOINT EFFORT OF THE HISTORIC AMERICAN ENGINEERING RECORD (HAER) AND THE HISTORIC AMERICAN BUILDINGS SURVEY (HABS). THE RECORDS WILL BE FILED IN THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS AS AN ADDENDUM TO THE 1963 HABS RECORDS FOR THE BUILDING. THE RESEARCH WAS COMPLETED IN THE SUMMER OF 1979 WITH HAER ARCHITECT DONALD F STEVENSON, AIA, PROJECT DIRECTOR; RITA GORAMARA (TEXAS A & M UNIVERSITY), PROJECT SUPERVISOR; TOBIN KENDRICK (MONTANA STATE UNIVERSITY), ARCHITECTURAL TECHNICIAN, AND HAER PHOTOGRAPHER JET LOWE. THE DOCUMENTATION WAS COMPLETED IN THE SUMMER OF 1980 WITH HABS ARCHITECT JOHN A. BURNS, AIA, PROJECT DIRECTOR, RITA GORAMARA, AIA (ASSOCIATE), PROJECT SUPERVISOR; CHARLES E. GREGERSEN, AIA, PROJECT HISTORIAN; LAURA L. HOCHULI (UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN-MILWAUKEE), FOREMAN, AND CATHY L. BERLOW (UNIVERSITY OF FLORIDA), J. MICHAEL PALMER (UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA), WILLIAM PERCIVAL (ILLINOIS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY), AND AUGUST VENTURA (COOPER UNION), ARCHITECTURAL TECHNICIANS.

THE AUDITORIUM BUILDING, NOW ROOSEVELT UNIVERSITY, WAS THE LARGEST STRUCTURE OF ITS KIND IN AMERICA AT THE TIME OF ITS COMPLETION IN 1890. DESIGNED BY DANKMAR ADLER (1844-1900) AND LOUIS H. SULLIVAN (1856-1924), THE 4,237 SEAT THEATER, HOTEL, AND OFFICE BUILDING EARNED A NATIONAL REPUTATION FOR THEIR FIRM.

THE COMPLEXITY OF A STRUCTURE CONTAINING THREE UNRELATED FUNCTIONS ON A SMALL SITE CREATED DESIGN PROBLEMS OF SPACE AND ACCESS FOR THE ARCHITECTS AND ENGINEERS. THE COMBINATION OF THESE FACTORS WITH THE DESIRE OF THE PROMOTERS TO HAVE THE LATEST CONVENIENCES AND MOST LUXURIOUS SURROUNDINGS REQUIRED STATE OF THE ART STRUCTURAL SYSTEMS AND ASSOCIATED BUILDING TECHNOLOGY. THE RESULT IS A BUILDING THAT IN ITS STRUCTURAL, HEATING, VENTILATING, COOLING, LIGHTING, ELECTRICAL, HYDRAULIC, AND SANITARY SYSTEMS REVEALS ALL THE VIRTUES AND LIMITATIONS OF THE AVAILABLE TECHNOLOGY OF THAT TIME.

THE HYDRAULIC MACHINERY OF THE AUDITORIUM STAGE IS BASED ON THE DESIGN OF BUDAPEST'S ASPHALEIA STAGE. THE TWO FLOORS BELOW THE STAGE FLOOR CONTAIN THE HYDRAULIC MACHINERY WHICH IS REQUIRED TO OPERATE THE SYSTEM OF 14 LIFTS AND TRAPS. A SECTION OF THE STAGE FLOOR, 46 FT. BY 36 FT., HAS FOUR LIFTS WHICH CAN BE ELEVATED OR DEPRESSED. EACH LIFT, 46 FT LONG BY 9 FT. WIDE, CAN BE ELEVATED 15 FT, SINK 7 FT. BELOW STAGE LEVEL, OR BE MOVED LATERALLY ACROSS THE WIDTH OF THE STAGE. PIERCING EACH LIFT IS A TRAP MEASURING 26 FT BY 4 FT. THESE SMALLER TRAPS CAN BE LOWERED 18 FT. BELOW STAGE LEVEL. THEY IN TURN EACH CARRY AN AUXILIARY TRAP 4 FT. BY 6 FT. THAT CAN BE OPERATED INDEPENDENTLY OR IN CONJUCTION WITH THE OTHER TRAPS. THE AUXILIARY TRAPS HAVE A VERTICAL MOVEMENT OF 18 FT. PLUS THAT OF THE LARGER LIFT WHICH CARRIES IT. IN ADDITION TO THE ABOVE 12 TRAPS ARE TWO STAR TRAPS, BOTH WITH A TRAVEL OF 9 FT. LOCATED ON THE 15TH FLOOR ARE WATER TANKS PROVIDING THE PRESSURE NECESSARY TO OPERATE THE HYDRAULIC MACHINERY.

THE FOUNDATION OF THE TOWER IS ONE LARGE FOOTING APPROXIMATELY 67 FT BY 100 FT. THIS FOOTING (AS WELL AS THE BUILDING'S OTHER FOOTINGS) CONSISTS OF TWO LAYERS OF 12 INCH TIMBERS LAID PERPENDICULAR TO EACH OTHER IN PREPARED BEDS OF GRAVEL. ABOVE THE TIMBERS IS A STEPPED GRILLAGE OF RAILROAD RAILS, STEEL BEAMS, OR BOTH EMBEDDED IN CONCRETE. THIS GRILLAGE IS TOPPED WITH DIMENSION STONE OR RUBBLE PIERS.

ALONG CONGRESS STREET IS A ROW OF LIGHTLY LOADED COLUMNS. THEIR SETTLEMENT WAS ANTICIPATED TO BE LESS THAN THE REST OF THE STRUCTURE SINCE THEY CARRY LOADS OF ONLY ONE STORY. TO ALLOW FOR FUTURE ADJUSTMENT, SCREWJACKS WITH A RUN OF SIX INCHES WERE INSERTED AT THE TOPS OF THESE COLUMNS.

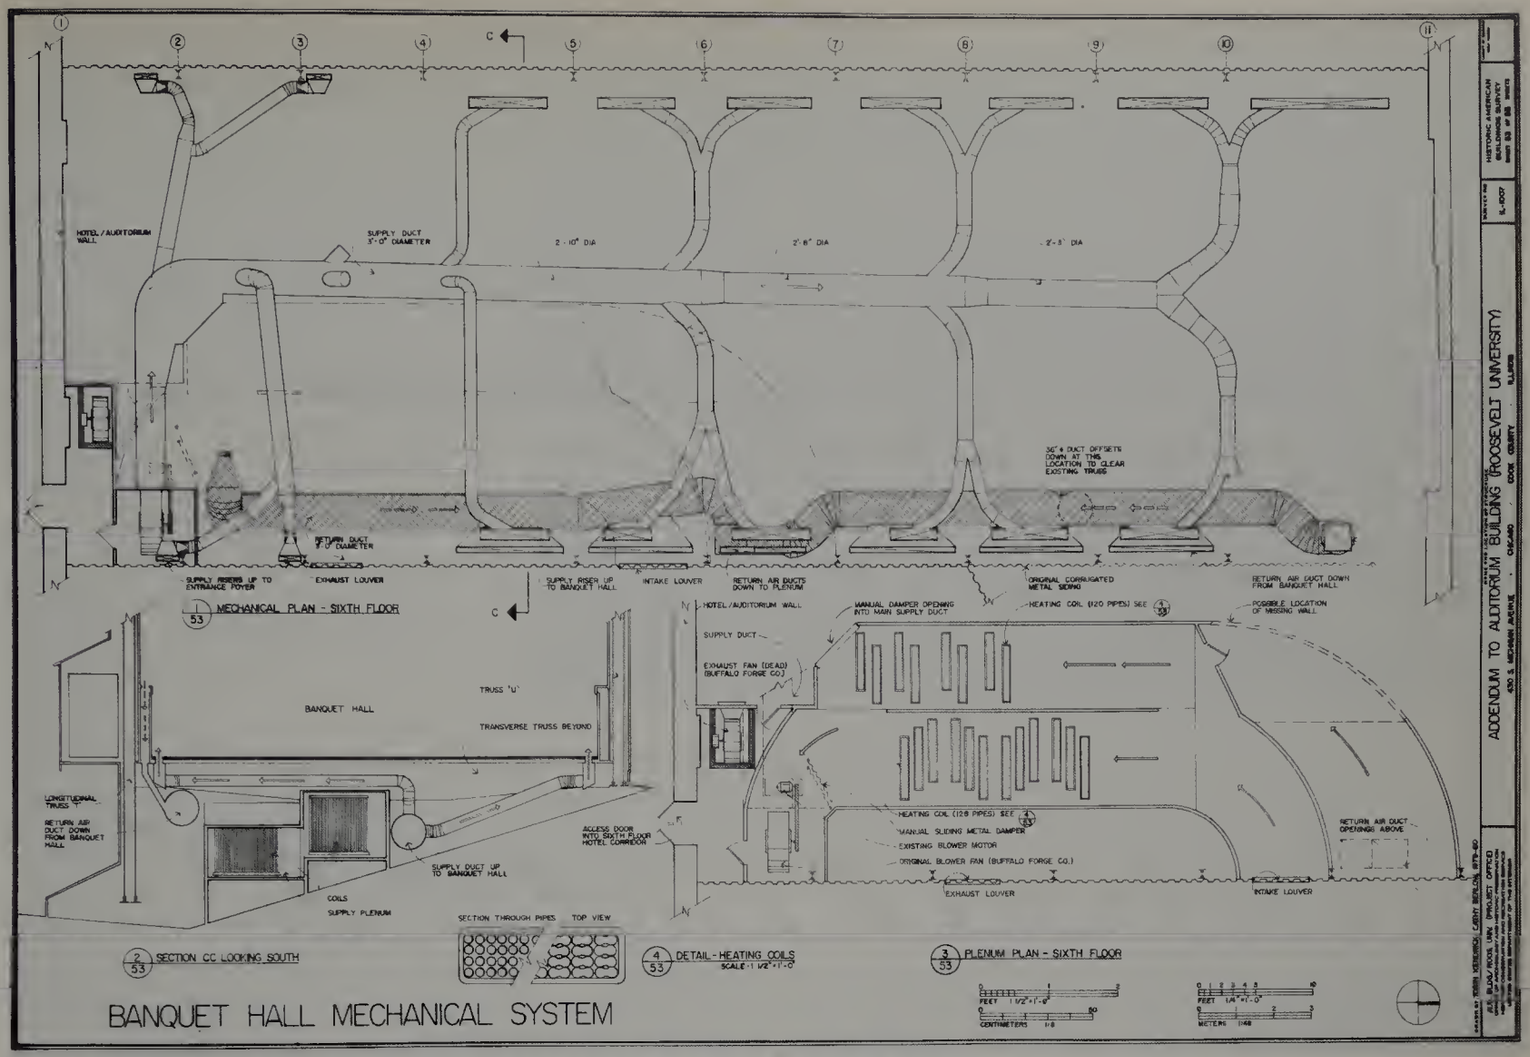

Figure 13 (opposite, top) Addendum to Auditorium Building (Roosevelt University), 1887–90, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. Although the Auditorium Building was recorded by HABS in 1963, the seven sheets of drawings did not assess the overall significance of the building. They included a title sheet, one floor plan, one elevation, one section, and three sheets of decorative details. This 1981 axonometric drawing, one of a set of fifty-three, shows the two elevations not drawn in 1963, the volumetric massing of the building, and a roof plan. The one drawing thus provides several different types of information. Buildings the size and complexity of the Auditorium Building demand a sophisticated assessment of their significance. Title sheet. Drawing by Willie Graham and David T. Marsh, 1981. (HABS IL–1007, sheet 1 of 53 sheets)

Figure 14 (opposite, bottom) Addendum to Auditorium Building (Roosevelt University), 1887–90, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. A drawing is the only adequate means of explaining the foundation design of the Auditorium Building. The architects, Adler and Sullivan, devised a system of spread footings to carry both linear (bearing walls) and point (columns) loadings with widely varying loads, everything from vaults under the sidewalks to a seventeen-story masonry tower. Basement-structure, drawn by Laura L. Hochuli, 1980. (HABS IL–1007, sheet 13 of 53 sheets)

The original system was recorded before the modifications were made. Banquet Hall mechanical system. Drawing by Tobin Kendrick and Cathy Berlow, 1979–80. (HABS IL–1007, sheet 53 of 53 sheets)

Hangars are to the right of the building, which was completed in 1933 to the designs of the firm of Delano & Aldrich as a combined marine/air terminal. Buildings of the twentieth century, often designed for unprecedented functions, increasingly qualify for HABS documentation. This structure is now the Miami City Hall and was recorded as part of a special HABS survey of that building type. Copy of a photograph, ca. 1940, by Pan Am. Figure 18 (opposite) Fort Mifflin, 1771 and later, Philadelphia, Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania. Plan drawn by Henry Belin, 1839. This photographic copy is one of the many maps, drawings, and photographs relating to Fort Mifflin in collections from England to California. Rather than copy all of the material, HABS prepared a catalog of graphic material with 143 entries. Bibliographic citations were given for each item. Some of the most informative drawings were then copied for the HABS collection. The result is a thorough but not overly duplicative record of the fort's history. Figure 19 St. Mary's Seminary, 1876–78, Baltimore, Maryland. Because St. Mary's Seminary was threatened by imminent demolition, photogrammetry was the only practical means to record it, given the time and money available. Control points noted on each stereopair relate them to one another. Drawings have not been made, but the forty-five stereopairs contain the information needed to produce them. Figure 20 Central portion of the Pueblo of Tesuque, Santa Fe County, New Mexico. Using glass-plate aerial stereopairs from 1973, reverse perspective analysis was used to plot the camera stations, axis, and focal lengths for historic photographs from 1879, 1899, and 1925. Using known dimensions from the 1973 photogrammetric studies, measured drawings could then be prepared for the three earlier views. This drawing shows the location of the earlier views superimposed on the 1973 plan of the site. Measured drawing plotted by Perry E. Borchers; drawn by Julsing Lamsan, 1973. Figure 21 Lundale Farm-House (Samuel Townsend House), late eighteenth-early nineteenth century, Pughtown vicinity, Chester County, Pennsylvania. North elevation. The owner of this house granted an easement to the National Trust for Historic Preservation. Drawings were needed as the legal record of the condition of the house at the time the easement was granted. The window spacing and alignment were irregular on this facade, so a rectified photograph was used to locate each window precisely. Drawing by Susan M. Dornbusch, 1978. (HABS PA–1308, sheet 6/6 of 7 sheets)

Figure 22 Lundale Farm-House (Samuel Townsend House). North (rear) elevation. This field photograph was enlarged to the same scale as the drawing from a perspective-corrected field photograph. The result is a rudimentary form of rectified photography that proved to be more accurate than hand measurements in locating the windows precisely. Note, however, that the cornice is slightly distorted because it is in front of the image plane and that the roof ridge and chimneys are quite distorted because they are so far beyond the image plane. Figure 23 Vieux Carré Squares Historic District, Lafcadio Hearn Domicile, 516 Bourbon Street, New Orleans, Louisiana. Sketch plans such as this one are meant to be a supplement to photographs and data, not a replacement for measured drawings. They are quite useful in presenting room arrangments and openings, particularly in irregular structures, when the significance of a building does not warrant measured drawings. Photographs are often keyed to these plans. Sketch plan, drawn by G. B. Brennan, 1938.

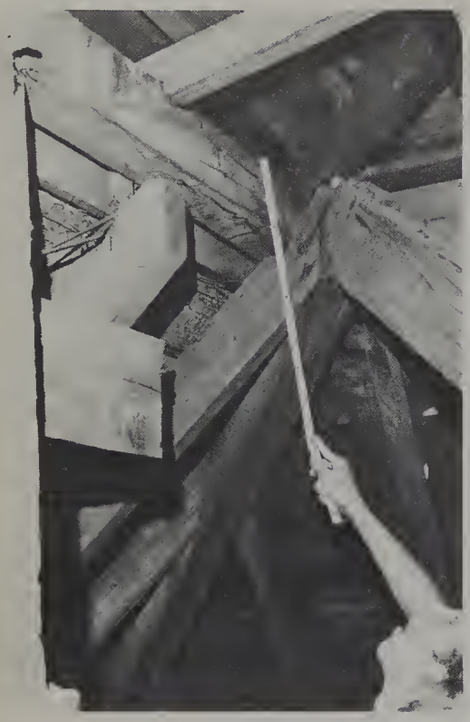

Figure 24 Drayton Hall, Charleston vicinity, Charleston County, South Carolina. In addition to the standard HABS format records transmitted to the Library of Congress, field photographs such as this one are often included as unofficial supplemental documentation. important buildings. The years following 1860 brought the widespread acceptance of balloon and platform framing, iron and steel structural systems, elevators, electricity, and the automobile. Architects went from being craftsmen to being designers; engineering developed as a profession. Buildings became less and less empirically designed and more and more scientifically designed. Their designs were based on proven knowledge of the strength and characteristics of materials and on mathematical formulas. These scientifically designed buildings cannot be evaluated using the same criteria as those used for empirically designed buildings. Therein lies the big difference for architectural documentation in the 1980s.

The present demands a new philosophical approach to assessing significance in historic buildings. Buildings will be studied with a holistic rather than a stylistic or art-historical approach. There will be more emphasis on the physical history of a building, its design, how it was constructed, and how it has been used. Implicit in this development is the need for trained professionals capable of assessing significance in both stylistic and technological terms. Researchers will need to be able to evaluate the multiplicity of records available concerning the history of post-1860 buildings. Historical studies of buildings types similar to the narrowly distributed HABS Shaker catalog (Shaker Built: A Catalog of Shaker Architectural Records from the Historic American Buildings Survey, edited by John C. Poppeliers and Deborah E. Stephens, published in 1974) and an unpublished study of theaters should be developed. Existing HABS records, supplemented as gaps in the HABS collection are identified, provide the resources for such studies. Special emphasis should be placed on building types dependent on technology, such as airports and gas stations, which are replaced long before they are old enough to be considered historic. Concurrent with studies of building types should be studies of building components that have had a major impact on architecture, such as balloon framing, heating, ventilating, and air conditioning (HVAC) systems, and standardized construction.

Better records and improved recordkeeping as well as increased public awareness of the importance of architectural records will make research easier. Broader research can be carried out on the physical history of buildings using original drawings and specifications, tax records, building permits, insurance records, trade journals, manufacturers catalogs, and city directories. Historic photographs are an especially important source of information for the period 1860–1933. HABS should develop indexes and other reference tools for material in other collections that is not copied for the record but which might be useful to later researchers. Such aids will help avoid duplication of effort .

New technologies will provide more cost-effective means of assembling information in architectural documentation. Advances in photography and photographic sciences and computers will be most influential. Computer-generated finding aids such as the HABS/HAER checklist in this publication and other indexes will simplify access to existing records. For instance, users will be able to search the HABS/HAER data base by state, county, vicinity, name, date, function, architect, or engineer. In another example, computers have been used by the Jet Propulsion Laboratory to enhance photographs from the space program in order to retrieve more information than is visible to the naked eye. The technique works as well on terrestrial photographs as on celestial and has already been used to enhance historic photographs.

Photogrammetry will be used far more extensively, particularly the preparation of stereopairs and control data, which will be plotted and drawn only as necessary. Since plotting and drawing is the most expensive part of photogrammetry, this will allow more buildings to be documented for a given expenditure while still retaining the capability to produce measured drawings. A photogrammetric technique called reverse perspective analysis can be used to prepare drawings for buildings that have been demolished, but for which photographs remain and a few dimensions can be determined. Rectified photography, although less versatile than stereo photogrammetry because its accuracy is limited to one plane, can be used to record room elevations or flat facades.

Changes in the number and nature of the buildings being recorded and the available personnel and appropriations to accomplish that recording will determine future HABS documentation efforts. HABS has traditionally relied on three forms of documentation—hand-measured architectural drawings, large-format photographs, and written historical and descriptive data in outline format—no matter what the relative significance of the building. There are alternatives, all of which have been used by the Survey. Sketch plans are simple page-size drawings which show the room arrangement and location of openings but no detail. Architectural data forms are one-page, fill-in-the-blank forms ideal for less significant buildings. Field photographs are generally 35-millimeter black-and-white photographs that contain valuable information simply by virtue of being more numerous than the more expensive large-format photographs can be.

Evolutionary change in HABS methodology will continue to occur. Suggestions for assessment and adjustment from within the program, from users of the collection, and from others are a welcome part of that process.

A Rich Vein in the Mother Lode: HABS in the Library of Congress

by

C. FORD PEATROSS

Since its creation fifty years ago the Historic American Buildings Survey has become one of the largest, best-known, and most widely used and copied of the special collections in the Library of Congress. Its popularity has influenced the collecting policies for the Library's general and specialized collections, where the increase of materials relating to the history and development of American architecture and engineering has mirrored the growth of the HABS and HAER collections. Within the Library's Prints and Photographs Division (begun in 1897 as the Prints Division, reorganized as the Fine Arts Division in 1929, and reorganized again under its current name in 1945), custodian of the HABS/HAER collections, the organization and subject access to supplemental materials in documentary photography and popular and applied graphic arts have reflected the needs of HABS users.

Figure 1 Frances Benjamin Johnston, preeminent photographer of American garden and estate architecture and historic buildings, and the single greatest individual contributor to the collections of architectural photographs at the Library of Congress. Her work is included in both the Pictorial Archives of Early American Architecture and the Carnegie Survey of the Architecture of the South. She donated tens of thousands of negatives, prints, and lantern slides over a period of twenty years. (LC–USZ62–80299)

In its acquisitions the Library has attempted since the 1930s to build upon the strengths of the HABS collections and to counter certain unavoidable weaknesses in them. A great collection of collections has thus been assembled. Together with the HABS/HAER records for almost seventeen thousand sites and structures in the United States and its territories and possessions, one can consult superb supplementary collections of books and serials, catalogs, maps, manuscripts, prints, photographs, and drawings. Information concerning related holdings throughout the country is also available. Extensive documentation on architecture all over the world has been assembled, facilitating comparative study.

Perhaps no other nation enjoys such remarkable resources for the study of its architecture, yet researchers have only started to plumb their depths. With the publication of this catalog and the creation of an automated data base, a new chapter is begun. To better understand the possibilities for the future, however, we must start with an examination of the origins of the Library's interest and acquisitions in architecture in the century before HABS.

The rich architectural collections of the Library of Congress can be said to have begun with the acquisition by Congress in 1815 of the library of Thomas Jefferson, the young nation's third president. That library naturally reflected the tastes and interests of a man whom the marquis de Chastellux in 1784 described as "the first American who has consulted the Fine Arts to know how he should shelter himself from the weather" (figs. 2, 3). With Mr. Jefferson's library, the Congress began the expansion of a small reference collection to an intellectual storehouse which reflected his omnivorous genius. The fine arts, and architecture in particular, have since remained a focus of the collecting policies of the Library of Congress. The dramatic growth of the Library's collections has prompted equally dramatic increases in its physical size. From a series of rooms in the Capitol (figs. 4, 5) to the present group of three buildings (figs. 6, 7) adjacent to that structure, the Library has grown and required its own architecture.

Figure 2 Monticello, near Charlottesville, Albemarle County, Virginia, the plantation house designed and repeatedly modified between 1769 and 1809 according to the tastes of its owner, Thomas Jefferson, third president of the United States. (LC–T3–1137017)

After the arrival in Washington of Jefferson's library, three events in the late 1860s marked major increases in the Library's holdings. First came the transfer of the library of the Smithsonian Institution in 1866. This collection, according to Joseph Henry, secretary of the Smithsonian and responsible for the transfer, was sufficient to make the Library of Congress "worthy of the name of the National Library" (fig. 8). Next came the acquisition by act of Congress in 1867 of the magnificent collection of Americana assembled by Peter Force, which included an architectural drawing, Force's own competitive design for the Washington Monument (fig. 9). Third, and most important, was Librarian Ainsworth Rand Spofford's successful attempt to consolidate responsibility for administering the U.S. Copyright Law within the Library of Congress, ensuring that his institution would receive deposit copies of everything from books to photographs and architectural drawings. In the 1860s the Library began to acquire as well a limited number of photographs of architectural subjects for reference purposes (fig. 10). From these beginnings in the third quarter of the nineteenth century grew collections of architectural documents now totaling over a million items.

Naturally the Library had received architectural publications between 1815 and the 1860s. Architects had frequently provided the illustrations for general periodicals; in fact, Charles Bulfinch, later architect of the Capitol, was responsible for some of the earliest of these (fig. 11). In general, however, it was not until the twentieth century that the Library made a special effort to acquire original architectural drawings, including early drawings related to such popular periodical illustrations (fig. 12). With the Copyright Law of 1870 the Library not only began to receive new deposits but also acquired those deposits which had been made in the U. S. district courts since early in the nineteenth century. Both nineteenth-century American life and architectural aspirations are handsomely documented in the thousands of individually published prints which came into the Library's collections with these retrospective deposits. In an 1825 engraving depicting the never-realized dream of British architect Whitman Stidwell's plan for Robert Dale Owen's well-ordered utopian community at New Harmony, Indiana (fig. 13), or in the picturesque layout for such an influential work as Greenwood Cemetery (fig. 14), begun near New York in 1839, peculiarly American visions are preserved.

Over seventy thousand photographs in various formats had been deposited for copyright by 1896, as were over six thousand designs, models, and drawings. Together these constitute a remarkable survey of American architecture of the period. For example, one can trace the work of a single architect throughout his career, even in varying locales. The dramatic change in the scale and appearance of Napoleon LeBrun's buildings from 1842 until 1909 can be seen in three different types of copyright deposits. First, a stereograph deposited in 1861 by the photographer, McAllister & Brother, as part of a series depicting Philadelphia's churches, shows one of LeBrun's first independent works, the Seventh Presbyterian Church built in Philadelphia in 1842 (fig. 15). A photograph deposited by the trustees of New York's Masonic Hall and Asylum Fund in 1870, and one of the last to be entered for copyright in a district court, shows LeBrun's perspective rendering for an elaborate Second Empire structure (fig. 16). Last, a large photograph deposited by photographer Irving Underhill in 1909 shows the towering Venetian campanile added to LeBrun's Metropolitan Life Insurance Building by his sons, who continued his practice (fig. 17). Similarly, copyright records preserve the Philadelphia work of architect John McArthur, Jr. It is unusual that the architect deposited the original drawing—rather than a copy—of his unsuccessful 1873 entry for the main building of the Centennial Exposition (fig. 18). The following year he registered a photographic copy of his perspective rendering for Philadelphia's New City Buildings, for which he was successful in winning the commission (fig. 19). McArthur himself, together with chief assistant architect Thomas Ustick Walter and building superintendent William C. McPherson, can be seen posing before the same building while it was still under construction in an 1874 stereograph deposited by photographer James Cremer (fig. 20). Whether viewed as an object of civic pride, as Pittsburgh's Smithfield Street Bridge must have been soon after its completion by engineer Gustave Lindenthal in 1883 (fig. 21), or illustrated for commercial promotion, as were countless buildings and details in handsome manufacturers catalogs (fig. 22), much of nineteenth-century American architecture is revealed in the Library's contemporary copyright deposits.

Even while such copyright material was streaming in, the Library was also building its small reference collection of photographs of foreign architectural monuments to one exhaustive in geographical and chronological scope. Primarily through gift, purchase, transfer, and exchange, the Library was at the turn of the century adding an average of five thousand photographs of architecture, sculpture, and painting to its collections each year. The emphasis was primarily on sites in the Mediterranean countries, the Near East, Europe, and the British Isles. In 1893, for example, Sultan Abdul-Hamid II of Turkey presented a fifty-one-volume photographic survey of his country to "the National Library of the United States of Amer-

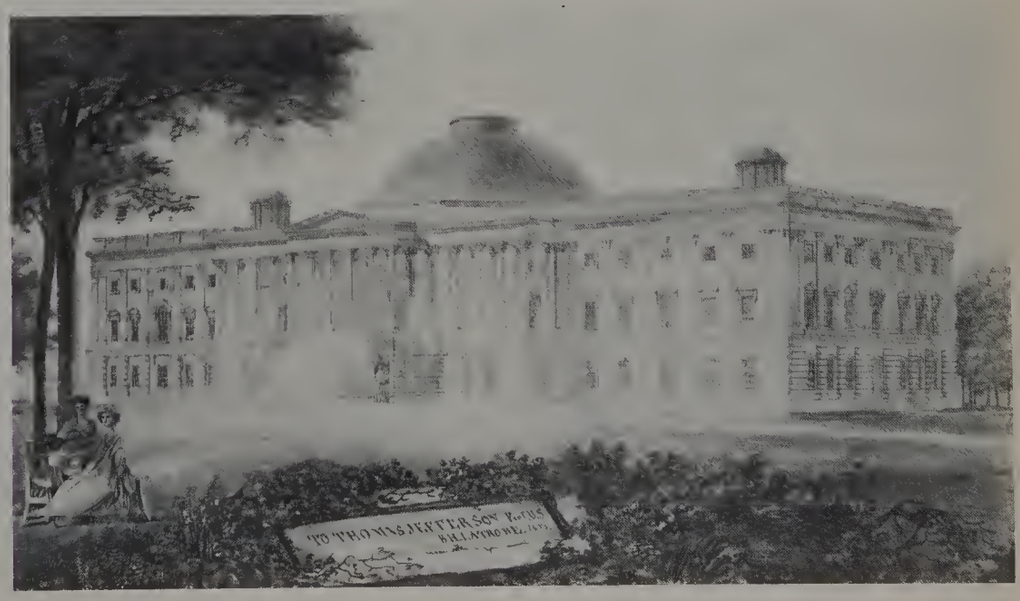

Figure 3 Perspective view of the east and north fronts of the United States Capitol, Washington, D. C., as B. Henry Latrobe proposed to complete it, 1806. The drawing is dedicated to President Jefferson, who had appointed Latrobe surveyor of public buildings for the United States in 1803, beginning six years of official collaboration. Neither Latrobe nor Jefferson lived to see the completion of the central domed section of the Capitol, which the latter envisioned as "the first temple dedicated to the sovereignty of the people, embellishing with Athenian taste the course of a nation looking far beyond the range of Athenian destinies." This handsome watercolor rendering was presented to the Library of Congress in 1975 by William Morrow Roosevelt of Whitemarsh, Pennsylvania, who had inherited it from his grandfather, Nicholas Latrobe Roosevelt. It joined over two hundred other works by Latrobe in the Architectural Drawings Collection in the Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–37195) ica" (fig. 23). In 1914 the Library purchased 732 large contact photoprints made from negatives taken of sites in Germany, Greece, and the Near East for the Königliche Preussische Messbildanstalt, perhaps the first attempt at a photogrammetric architectural survey (fig. 24). Today the majority of the images thus secured are filed in series by size, country, city, town or site, and building name. In the largest of these geographic files, one can today consult over fifty thousand foreign views. Typical of the type of reference prints in these extensive foreign geographical collections are those acquired from the noted firm of Bonfils. An example shows an Egyptian temple built at Dendur by the Romans (fig. 25). A comparison with a copyright deposit photograph of New York's monumental but short-lived Egyptian Revival prison known as the "Tombs" just before its demolition, shows the assimilation of ancient architectural forms for modern purposes (fig. 26). Many institutions formed collections of such architectural views, purchased from commercial publishers, for they both furnished an excellent record of the world's historical architecture and provided inspiration for contemporary designers.

In certain subjects the Library's holdings are particularly strong, as in its photographs of the many fairs, expositions, and other architectural ensembles commissioned for special events in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Groups of photographs of these exuberant but transient sites and structures came into the Library both in sets copyrighted by commercial publishers and collections presented because of some official government participation or support. They preserve daring and often amusing essays in various historical and modern vocabularies, both foreign (fig. 27) and native (fig. 29). At their best they could be brilliant and innovative, expressing the finest in contemporary American design (figs. 30, 31).

The Library of Congress first began to systematically collect photographs documenting early American architecture and design in the late 1920s when Leicester B. Holland of Philadelphia, himself and architect and later chairman of the committee on the preservation of historic buildings of the American Institute of Architects, came to Washington to head its Fine Arts Division (Peterson, fig. 7). The first major acquisition which he secured in this area was through his friend Frances Benjamin Johnston, preeminent recorder of American gardens and estate architecture (fig. 1). In 1929 Johnston deposited over five thousand of her negatives with the Library for, in her own words, "the purpose of creating a national foundation for the study of early American architecture and of garden design."[1]

Even in her early journalistic work,

Putnam & Co., 1853), one of the architectural volumes that came to the Library of Congress with the transfer of the Smithsonian Institution Library in 1866. According to Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian, his institution's deposit helped to make the Library of Congress a truly national library. Although the Library came to possess two copies of this work with the 1944 transfer of the great architectural library of the supervising architect of the treasury, it is otherwise recorded in no other American library, nor in the latest edition of Henry-Russell Hitchcock's Architectural Books Published in America before 1895. Figure 9 Original drawing, 1837, of a proposed plan for the Washington Monument by Peter Force, Washington publisher, politician, and avid collector of Americana. One of the Library's principal acquisitions after the Jefferson and Smithsonian libraries was the purchase by an 1867 act of Congress of the Peter Force Library, which included among more than 22,500 volumes eighteenth-century American newspapers, incunabala, early American imprints, manuscripts, rare maps, and atlases, Force's own unsuccessful entry in the Washington Monument competition. This modified Egyptian pyramid would have taken up a considerably larger portion of both the mall and the Washington Monument Committee's budget than Robert Mills's winning design for the obelisk which stands today. Force's drawing is probably one of the first original architectural drawings to have come into the Library's collections. Architectural Drawings Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. In the foreground is the Tiber Creek or Washington City Canal, filled in around 1870, and the octagonal greenhouse designed by Thomas U. Walter for the Botanic Garden, which was then administered for Congress by its Joint Committee on the Library. It was also in the 1860s that the Library first began to acquire such architectural photographs for public reference, beginning with images of the principal public buildings of the capital. This particular example is a vintage salt print from the personal photographic album of Montgomery B. Meigs, who had been in charge of construction on the Capitol from 1853 until 1858. The album was presented to the Library by William H. Boswell of Washington, D. C., in 1980. Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–80394)

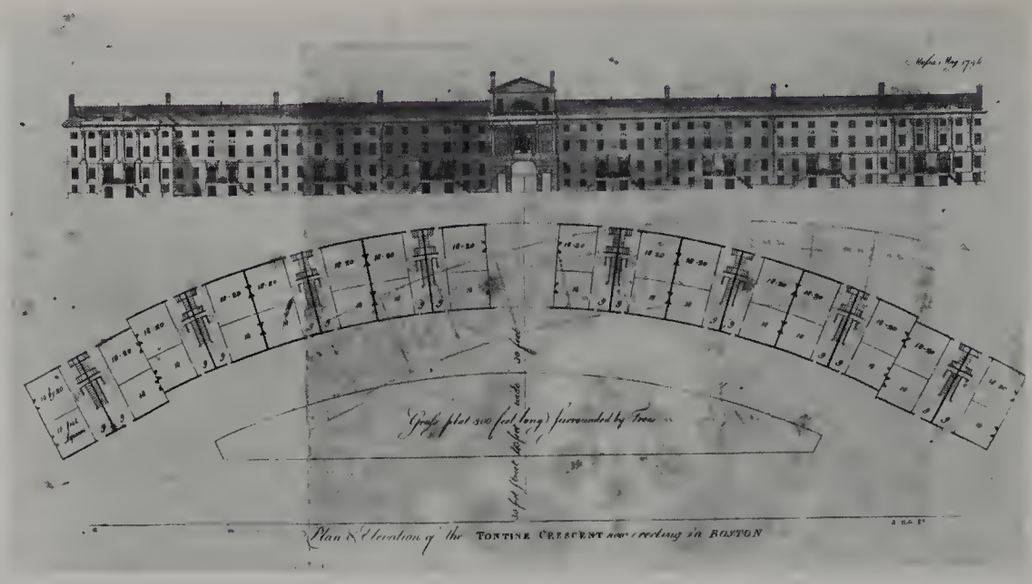

Figure 11 Engraving by S. Hill of the "plan and elevation of the Tontine Crescent, now erecting in Boston," published in volume two (1794) of the Massachusetts Magazine. The architect of this sophisticated bit of urban design, demolished about 1858, was Charles Bulfinch, who doubtless furnished the drawing on which this engraving was based. Similar serial publications, in which architectural illustrations appeared with increasing frequency, would have been found in the Library's collections before the 1860s. General Collections, Library of Congress. (LC–USZ62–31136)

Figure 12 Charles Bulfinch's original drawing for the central pavilion of the Tontine Crescent, probably one of a set from which S. Hill's engraving (fig. 11) was produced. It was not far removed in time or quality from the monumental English town planning of the Wood family in Bath, and its centerpiece featured an archway and pedestrian passages connecting two streets, with a first floor given over to the Boston Library Society and a second to the Massachusetts Historical Society. In the 1930s, as a complement to HABS, the Library made a concerted effort to form a representative collection of original early American architectural drawings, and this is one of many Bulfinch drawings deposited in 1935 by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Architectural Drawings Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–32386)

Johnston had shown a predilection for architectural themes (fig. 32), and her eye had captured subjects ranging from the Oriental composition of the Gamble House and garden in Pasadena (fig. 33) to the formal parterres of Whitemarsh Hall near Philadelphia (fig. 34). Through Miss Johnston's generosity the Library eventually fell heir to tens of thousands of her negatives and prints of American houses and their gardens and interiors. Those redolent images preserve a time and a way of life difficult for HABS to recapture, and they have therefore become a rich documentary complement to that collection. Indeed, without Frances Benjamin Johnston's pioneering efforts and generosity, the Historic American Buildings Survey would probably not be what it is today.

In 1927, two years before her first major gift to the Library, Johnston had been commissioned by Mrs. Daniel B. Devore to do an architectural survey of the Fredericksburg and Falmouth, Virginia, area (fig. 35). In these photographs, which were used for a popular traveling exhibition, Johnston's subjects presaged the directions laid out for HABS by Charles Peterson in 1933, for she made a special effort to record characteristic American building types and forms of construction. These included both grand and rudimentary structures, from great plantation and town houses to frontier cabins and their barns, sheds, mills, and fences. From 1930 through the early 1940s the Library continued where Devore had left off, creating what has come to be known as the Carnegie Survey of the Architecture of the South. During that time, through grants from the Carnegie Corporation administered by the Library of Congress, Frances Benjamin Johnston traveled through Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. She made almost eight thousand photographs in which the vanishing architectural heritage of that region has been preserved.

In 1930 Holland also began the Pictorial Archives of Early American Architecture. Through newspapers, professional and trade association journals, and even radio talks, he solicited gifts of architectural negatives from donors across the country. Within ten years, over ten thousand negatives had been assembled in this collection, and reference prints of a substantial portion of them had been made, again with funds given by the Carnegie Corporation (fig. 36). The Pictorial Archives was soon overshadowed by the Historic American Buildings Survey, which featured standardized measured drawings and written information in addition to photographs and was broader in range and more uniform in quality. It is doubtful whether the Library of Congress could have accepted, assimilated, and served the HABS records in such a timely way, however, without its four years of experience with the Pictorial Archives, which might be considered a parent to HABS. The former required a program for cataloging a large collection of photographic negatives and prints in different formats, from multiple sources, and representing buildings and sites in many locations and not consistently fully identified. Thus, when HABS began in 1933 as an emergency relief project, a system which allowed the immediate cataloging and public use of its records was already in place, for it had been tested and proven with the Pictorial Archives.

It is still amazing to consider that between November 1933 and March 1934 HABS put 772 architects to work across the country and produced over five thousand sheets of measured drawings of 880 sites and structures. Within weeks after the Survey began, an exhibition was held in Washington to display already completed records. Independent of the Survey, measured drawings were made of Philadelphia's Christ Church in September of the same year, but they too eventually made their way into the HABS collection (fig. 37). By 1941 the Library had received over twenty-three thousand measured drawings and twenty-five thousand photographs, representing over six thousand sites. In 1947 alone the Library received orders for over fourteen thousand copies of HABS records. Libraries and historical socie-

With its assumption of responsibility for administering U.S. copyright regulations in 1870, the Library acquired the retrospective deposits in the U.S. district courts. Included among these were thousands of popular prints like this 1825 lithograph published by the firm of Ingrey & Madeley. It shows Robert Dale Owen's ambitious plan for a complete, self-contained Utopian community of two thousand inhabitants. Never realized according to British architect Stedman Whitwell's plan, it nevertheless links early American urban planning to the development of late nineteenth-century industrial towns like Pullman, near Chicago, Illinois. Downing and Frederick Law Olmsted was on occasion adopted with perhaps greater zeal for the dead than for the living. ties in this country and abroad have purchased copies in microform. Now we look toward the technological advances offered by machine-readable catalogs and videodisk images to further increase accessibility of the collections.

Although the Prints and Photographs Division relinquished custody of the Library's fine arts books, its specialists remain partially responsible for this significant reference collection. The volumes in the Library's architecture classification alone number over seventy thousand and form part of the nation's largest architectural library. Books which are especially rare, valuable, or otherwise notable are kept as part of the growing Case Collection of the Prints and Photographs Division or in the Rare Book and Special Collections Division, which has recently announced a special program to rebuild Thomas Jefferson's architectural library, many volumes of which were lost in the fire of 1851. In the Prints and Photographs Division an effort is being made to fill gaps in the Library's holdings of certain specialized architectural publications, ranging from architectural club yearbooks to manufacturers catalogs. Another category includes publications usually described as "builder's guides" or "pattern books," which were so influential in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century America. In the form of model house plan books they continue to be popular today. Recent acquisitions include the first edition of Owen Biddle's Young Carpenter's Assistant (Philadelphia, 1805). It includes an engraved elevation of the spire of Philadelphia's Christ Church, which allowed the Gibbsian spire to serve as a model for countless other church spires in this country (fig. 38). Similarly, more recent publications which demonstrate the early influence of Frank Lloyd Wright on American domestic architecture have been purchased (figs. 39, 40).

Although published materials constitute a valuable adjunct to the HABS collection, collections of unique items provide documentation unavailable elsewhere. The Survey greatly expanded the Library's documentation of architecture in the American Southwest, including both Indian sites and outstanding examples of Spanish colonial influence, as in the mission church of San Xavier del Bac (fig. 41). The HABS record has been expanded in parallel collections. Because the Library possessed limited records concerning the architecture of neighboring Latin America, it created the Archives of Hispanic Culture during the early 1940s with funds from the Rockefeller Foundation. Photographs of architecture, painting, and sculpture in Latin America were collected and commissioned. Used in conjunction with HABS, the materials assembled provide an excellent basis for comparative study (fig. 42). Further, in 1950 the hundreds of historical photographs of American Spanish Colonial architecture collected by historian Prentice Duell were given to the Library, as was two years later a large collection of photographs of Spanish architecture assembled by Georgiana Goddard King.

A number of large collections of documentary photographs, all rich in architectural subject matter, either came into the Library during the 1940s and early 1950s or were first made generally accessible during that period. In 1944, for instance, the now-famous Farm Security Administration/Office of War Information (FSA/OWI) collection was transferred to the Library of Congress from the Department of Agriculture. In the Prints and Photographs Division, some seventy-five thousand FSA/OWI reference prints were arranged by geographic region and subject in a way that made them convenient to use in tandem with HABS materials. Thousands of these photographs, taken throughout the United States between 1935 and 1942, show buildings and the life in and around them. Even techniques of construction, both traditional and modern, are recorded (fig. 43).

The tens of thousands of copyright deposit photographs received by the Library—most before 1920—constituted a collection in and of themselves. Since the 1940s, a substantial portion of the copyright photographs have been progressively sorted and filed according to size, subject, and geographic location, making them an excellent companion to the HABS photographs. After their receipt in 1948, over four thousand photoprints in the Ordway Collection were similarly arranged by subject and location, providing access to the many images of historic buildings recorded during the Civil War and further represented in the Library's negatives by Mathew B. Brady. From the early 1950s, HABS users at the Library have thus found available to them additional views of American buildings ranging from a 1906 copyrighted view of "the only remaining sod school house in Decatur County, Kansas" by an obscure local photographer (fig. 44) to Brady's marvelous image showing Westover, one of America's greatest houses, without its distracting additions (fig. 45).

Figure 35 Staircase, Kenmore, Fredericksburg, Spotsylvania County, Virginia, built by Fielding Lewis after 1752 for his bride Betty Washington. Thomas Waterman has attributed the interior plasterwork—"the most beautiful in America"—to the "Gibbs Modern" style of John Ariss, ca. 1770. This 1927 photograph by Frances Benjamin Johnston was one in an architectural survey of Fredericksburg and Falmouth commissioned by Mrs. Daniel B. Devore. This project prompted the Carnegie Survey of the Architecture of the South and was subsequently absorbed into it. Under grants from the Carnegie Corporation administered by the Library of Congress, Johnston continued her photographic survey in Virginia through 1934. Thereafter, until 1943, she expanded the survey to include Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, producing a total of almost eight thousand large-format negatives. For this effort Frances Benjamin Johnston was made an honorary member of the American Institute of Architects in 1945, the first woman to receive honorary membership. Figure 36 (opposite) Congregational Church, Avon, Hartford County, Connecticut, built 1818–19 by David Hoadley. Photograph donated in June 1930 by Albert E. Robinson of New York City, the seventh of what came to be thousands of original negatives in the Library's Pictorial Archives of Early American Architecture. Established by a $5,000 grant from the Carnegie Corporation in 1930, the Pictorial Archives was conceived to establish a "national repository for photographic negatives of early American architecture, to preserve and make available to students of history . . . records of our rapidly disappearing ancestral homes." The collection sought to include a wide range of characteristic American building types but naturally was limited to the subjects and locations popular for architectural photographers up until the early 1930s. This handsome Federal church in New England is typical of those biases. Although comprising only photographs, the Pictorial Archives both provided model for HABS and indicated the Library as its logical repository. In fact, HABS was at first considered a part of the Pictorial Archives, which by 1938 included almost ten thousand negatives by such varied photographers as John Mead Howells, Frances Benjamin Johnston, Delos Smith, Thomas Tileston Waterman, and Francis M. Wigmore. Reference prints were cataloged and organized according to state, county, and city or vicinity. HABS, however, with its more truly national scope and standardized format, soon outpaced its parent collection. Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–PAEAA CONN, 2–AVOE, 1–1)

North Elevation

Figure 37 North elevation of Christ Church, Philadelphia, Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania. Measured drawing by J. Spence, Jr., under the supervision of Horace Wells Sellers, September 1933. This drawing, dated only a few months before HABS officially began, was apparently commissioned by the Old Christ Church Preservation Trust. Subsequently it became part of the HABS collection, as have many drawings prepared to HABS standards by others. Begun in 1727 with a spire added in 1754, Philadelphia's Christ Church has been described as the most advanced and the most completely English church in the colonies. Prints and Photographs Division. postcards—the Detroit Publishing Company and the Wittemann Brothers (Albertype) Company—were received in 1949 and 1953, respectively. Each collection added over twenty thousand reference prints to the geographic and subject reference files in the Prints and Photographs Division. Made up primarily of views of cities, towns, buildings, parks, and resorts (figs. 46, 47), the Detroit and Wittemann materials constitute a remarkable record of American buildings and landscape from about 1890 through 1930.

The most recent comparable acquisition is the Gottscho-Schleisner collection. Comprising over twenty-three thousand architectural negatives dating primarily from the 1930s through 1968, this record group includes more recent buildings and sites, helping to round out the Library's representation of American buildings of the last fifty years. Many designers and building types characteristic of this period are included, from Manhattan skyscrapers (fig. 49) to Miami hotels, from the work of John Russell Pope to that of Raymond Loewy and Morris Lapidus. Especially valuable are the collection's images of commercial and domestic interiors, subjects again difficult or impossible for documentary surveys like HABS to recapture (fig. 48).

Records of various American building types have been a focus of the Library's architectural acquisitions in the 1970s and 1980s. Several distinguished collections document buildings which share a common function but are geographically and chronologically diverse. The Seagram County Court House Archives, given in 1980, surveys over eleven hundred county courthouses in forty-eight states (fig. 50). From 1974 until 1976, Joseph E. Seagram & Sons commissioned twenty-four photographers to produce over eight thousand images. These photographs were cataloged under the Library's supervision according to a system modeled on HABS cataloging. The American Fire House Survey, similarly organized, documents over three hundred fire stations in thirty states (fig. 52). Received in 1982, the survey materials were created in 1978–79 by two Harvard students supported by a National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) Youthgrant and sponsored by the Library of Congress.

Hundreds of smaller or less comprehensive collections complement the HABS records received by the Library. The development of two other building types, theaters and service stations, can be observed in the collections of two individuals, one a recorder and the other a creator. Anthony F. Dumas's great passion was the American stage, and from 1916 until 1939 he traveled the major vaudeville and motion picture circuits, taking the time to produce 248 pen-and-ink drawings of the theaters he visited. Carl E. Petersen, on the other hand, was responsible for the design of thousands of service stations and other structures related to the automobile all over the United States from 1916 until 1965. As head of design for the Gulf (1916–23) and Pure (1925–57) oil companies he oversaw the development of the ubiquitous but now rapidly disappearing architectural forms which served the American automobile and transformed the face of our land. Following World War II, almost half of the estimated two hundred thousand stations in the United States were scheduled for rebuilding or replacement, a process documented in Petersen's drawings (fig. 52, 53).

The Library's holdings of the papers of architects and designers, found in both the Manuscript and Prints and Photographs Divisions, form an important supplement to the HABS collection, for they provide the evidence of the process whose result the Survey records. Four of these collections demonstrate their usefulness in different ways. Fifty years of experimentation in a wide variety of building types and styles can be observed in the collection of Arthur B. Heaton of Washington, D. C. For a 1936 hamburger restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue, Heaton produced fourteen very different designs, only to be informed by the Fine Arts Commission that his cupola to house the establishment's trademark, a blue bell, was inappropriate to the location (fig. 54). Architect and historian Thomas Tileston Waterman, at one time staff architect for HABS (Peterson, fig. 3), was both a creator and recorder of buildings, and his drawings reveal both activities (fig. 55). Historian Alfred Marie's tracings of eighteenth-century French estate plans (fig. 56) might appear unrelated to American architecture, but not when compared with Nathaniel Owings's master plan for Washington, D. C., based on similar principles (fig. 57).

This vital dialogue between documentary and original materials enlivens and enriches the study of architecture at the Library of Congress. To further stimulate and aid such research, the Library has since 1980 attempted to increase access to architectural

Figure 41 (above) South front and main entrance, Mission of San Xavier del Bac, Tucson vicinity, Arizona. HABS has recorded in great detail many examples of Spanish Colonial architecture in the American Southwest. These data have been supplemented at the Library of Congress by a number of collections of historical photographs of the same subjects. The most notable among these is the Prentice Duell Collection, presented to the Library in 1952, which includes hundreds of rare early views and details of Spanish missions. Photograph by Donald W. Although holding photographic documentation of the architecture of many civilizations, the Library lacked material on Latin America. From 1940 until 1944, aided by the Rockefeller Foundation, it therefore created a photographic reference collection of Latin American art and architecture known as the Archives of Hispanic Culture, which offers excellent material for comparative studies of Spanish influence. Figure 45 North or land front of Westover, the plantation house built about 1730 by William Byrd II near the James River in Charles County, Virginia. Photograph, July 1862. The original appearance of this, perhaps the finest country house erected in colonial America, is best seen in a view taken before the addition of flanking wings and other alterations. The Library's collection of photographs by Mathew B. Brady was enlarged in 1948 by the presentation of approximately forty-five hundred reference prints collected in the nineteenth century by Gen. Albert Ordway. Many early views of historic structures in this collection have been filed by subject and location, making them a useful adjunct to the collections created by HABS, which has recently completed measured drawings of Westover. Figure 44 "The only remaining sod school house in Decatur County, Kansas." Copyright deposit photograph by Joseph H. King, 1907. American photographers have sought to record many structures of the type we now call vernacular. (See Carl Lounsbury, "Vernacular Architecture in the Survey.") Little attempt had been made until the 1940s to organize the thousands of copyright deposit photographs received by the Library since 1870. When organizing and cataloging began, the influence of the already large use of the HABS collections was evident. Thus this photograph was cataloged by building type and geographic location. It includes over twenty-five thousand photoprints and fifty thousand photo-gelatin reproductions presented to the Library in 1953 by the souvenir booklet-publishing firm known under both names and based in Brooklyn, New York. Both the Detroit and the Wittemann collections are especially rich in their records of the resort, park, and main street architecture of turn-of-the-century America (Rifkind, fig. 1). Like HABS, they have been organized by the Library in a manner which allows access according to geographic location and building type or name. Figure 50 Exterior and entrance to the Woodbury County Court House, Sioux City, Iowa. Photograph by Bob Thall, ca. 1975. Built in 1913 to the designs of William L. Steele and Purcell & Elmslie, with architectural sculpture by Alfonso Iannelli, the simple but powerful massing and rich decoration of this structure offer eloquent testimony to the genius of the original architectural vocabulary which we have come to call the Prairie Style. This is one of over eleven hundred county courthouses in the United States represented in the Seagram County Court House Archives. As an American Revolution Bicentennial project, Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc., commissioned twenty-four photographers to travel throughout the United States. From 1974 to 1976 they produced over eight thousand images showing this peculiarly American building type in all its variety of scale, form, and material. The entire collection of photographic negatives, master and reference photoprints, and historical information was organized and cataloged under the direction of the Library of Congress according to a system modeled after that used for HABS and was presented to the Library in 1980. HABS began a more modest survey of building types in the 1960s, documenting the nation's great motion picture palaces, and it recently completed a similar but much more comprehensive project on city halls. Figure 51 Four theaters—the Allen, the Ohio, Loew's State, and B. F. Keith's—lined Cleveland's equivalent of the Great White Way. Original drawing by Alfred F. Dumas, ca. 1925. The great passion of Dumas, a restorer of paintings at New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, was the American vaudeville theater, which was quickly joined and eventually overwhelmed by the motion picture palace. HABS made a special effort in the 1960s and 1970s to document these rapidly vanishing monuments of cinematic splendor. Dumas, however, recorded hundreds of them in their heyday through simple pen-and-ink drawings apparently executed as he waited for the next show to begin. In 1979 the Library acquired almost three hundred of these drawings, dating from 1908 to 1935, through purchase and gift from Alfred Dumas's family. They are arranged by state, city, and building name. Dumas Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. (LC–USZ62–80407) records nationwide. This work has been through the quarterly publication of the COPAR (Cooperative Preservation of Architectural Records) Newsletter, the building of a national union index to architectural records in many different kinds of repositories, and the encouragement of the preservation and reporting of architectural documentation at the local and regional level. This, of course, supplements the written reports of the HABS collection, which have from the beginning made reference to the nature and location of primary source material.

Little could Thomas Jefferson have dreamed what his fine but modest library would grow into. Local and regional architectural styles are often mirrored in structures like fire houses. This example shows the Dutch influence typical in Albany. It is one of over three hundred fire stations recorded as part of the American Fire House Survey, a documentary collection created 1978–79 under an NEH Youth Grant to two Harvard students, Rebecca Zurier and Teresa Beyer, who were sponsored by the Library of Congress. The project also resulted in the publication of a book on the subject by Rebecca Zurier, The American Fire House, An Architectural and Social History (New York: Abbeyville Press, 1982). Figure 53 Original drawing by Carl E. Petersen, ca. 1945, showing how to remodel an early automobile service station into a larger and more modern version. For over fifty years the full-service gas station has been part of the daily lives of millions of Americans, yet these familiar structures have undergone frequent transformations and are rapidly disappearing altogether from the landscape. Carl E. Petersen designed buildings for Gulf Oil and Pure Oil. His book entitled The Station Ahead describes service station planning and construction. Although not a trained architect, he gave form to thousands of structures throughout the United States from 1914 through the 1950s, when he planned the first truck plazas for the rapidly growing interstate highway system. His drawings, given to the Library in 1980, preserve the development of the various building forms he created to serve an automobile culture. Petersen Collection, Prints and Photographs Division. Figure 54 Original drawing for a "Blue Bell System" hamburger restaurant designed in 1936 by architect Arthur B. Heaton for a location on Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D.C. It is one of seven varying designs by Heaton for what was at the time a relatively new building form. One of these proclaims, "Food for All, Hamburgers 5¢." This final version was submitted to the capital's Fine Arts Commission and was partially rejected. The cupola meant to house the blue bell was deemed "inappropriate." Here it has been struck through with the word "omit" written to its side. Heaton's files, dating from the 1890s through the 1940s, were presented to the Library in 1981 by Leon Chatelain III. They contain original correspondence, specifications, material and fixture catalogs, and thousands of working drawings, including full-scale details. These records reveal the practice of architecture over half a century and thus constitute an excellent supplement to the documentary records in HABS. Prints and Photographs Division. Figure 55 Measured drawing of the principal front, plan, and "carcase" framing of the floor of the great room of the Tebbs House at Dumfries, Prince William County, Virginia. Although not as grand as Westover (fig. 45), this fine early Georgian house built by Maj. Fouchee Tebbs makes an interesting comparison. Without the measured drawing made by Thomas Tileston Waterman in 1932, before the destruction of the house in 1933, such comparison would be impossible. Waterman, historical architect for Perry, Shaw and Hepburn at Colonial Williamsburg, staff architect for the HABS during the 1930s, and author of a number of books on American architecture, directed his family to give his papers to supplement the HABS materials in the Library of Congress. Many of his photographs were presented in 1953, and additional photographs, drawings, and the notebook containing this drawing came to the Library in 1980. The original maps are part of a survey commissioned after 1774 by Daniel Trudaine and Jean Rodolphe Perronnet to record the plans of eighteenth-century parks and formal gardens located along the "grandes routes" of France. This drawing shows four French estates: Chanteloup, la Noirville, Gravelle, and la Pretanière. Over two thousand such tracings, including many of original drawings for seventeenth- and eighteenth-century royal building projects, were purchased for the Library in the early 1950s by the Société Mansart, headed by historian Fiske Kimball. American planning has relied heavily on French precedent, from Pierre L'Enfant's original scheme for Washington through the "City Beautiful" movement at the beginning of this century to the present. Figure 57 Architect and planner Nathaniel Owings, partner in the firm of Skidmore, Owings and Merrill and 1982 recipient of the Gold Medal of the American Institute of Architects, standing before his plan for Washington, D.C. Owings here played a large role in reinforcing and further developing many of the principles proven in France and transported to this country almost two centuries earlier. Several presidents called upon his talents from the 1960s until he resigned as chairman of the Pennsylvania Avenue Development Corporation in 1982. Both Owings and his partner Louis Skidmore have deposited their papers in the Library of Congress, where they join those of William Thornton, Robert Mills, Montgomery C. Meigs, Frederick Law Olmsted, Charles Follen McKim, Cass Gilbert, and Ludwig Mies van der Rohe, among others. Such architectural fantasies are usually referred to as "architects' dreams," only this one was to a large extent true. Even a decade before the end of his career Gilbert had completed enough buildings to populate this imaginary city of considerable size, proving that early twentieth-century America could be a promised land for an ambitious, enterprising, and talented architect. ual and corporate, can all be seen in our architecture. The opportunities which this rich land has afforded its formgivers have rarely been matched in any time or place. Cass Gilbert's graphic inventory of his works is imaginary only in their juxtaposition (fig. 58). The building-up and the tearing-down will take place as long as we breathe; indeed it is one of the surest measures of our vitality. Samuel Gottscho's dramatic 1936 image fixes a moment in the ongoing transformation of Manhattan's skyline (fig. 59), a process that has continued since before the creation of this republic. It reflects the forces and talents at work throughout this land. The Historic American Buildings Survey and the Historic American Engineering Record should be as busy recording these achievements during the next half-century as they have been in the past fifty years. The collections of the Library of Congress reveal that their work has only begun.

LAND FRONT PORCH

Future Directions for the Historic American Buildings Survey

by

ROBERT J. KAPSCH

The Historic American Buildings Survey (HABS) has been documenting the architectural heritage of the United States since 1933. The subjects documented, the techniques used, the types of data collected, the purposes to which the documentation has been put, and the delivery of that documentation to the HABS user have all changed during the first fifty years. These changes have occurred because the needs of the architectural and academic communities for HABS documentation have changed, as have the opportunities to undertake such documentation. We expect HABS documentation to continue to evolve.

Certain administrative, legal, and regulatory mechanisms that will stimulate change have already been set in motion and we can begin to project with some certainty future directions for HABS. On March 25, 1982, for example, the deputy director of the National Park Service (NPS) sent a memorandum to regional directors stating the following: "I encourage you to use every practical opportunity to record the major historic structures of the National Park Service to the standards of the Historic American Buildings Survey (HABS) or the Historic American Engineering Record (HAER)." This directive was the result of several disastrous events that affected Park Service properties.

In January 1982, fire broke out at Franklin D. Roosevelt's birthplace, a Park Service property in Hyde Park, New York. Damage—particularly water damage—was extensive. The HABS measured drawings produced in 1941 by HABS architects Daniel M. C. Hopping and Frank Chouteau Brown and fifty-seven interior HABS photographs greatly assisted NPS architects planning the restoration of this historic building. The Hyde Park fire came soon after fire destroyed Marshall Hall, an eighteenth-century manor house in Maryland owned by the National Park Service. Fortunately, measurements for HABS drawings for this structure had been completed by the time of the fire. These measurements will be used to prepare HABS drawings for this structure, thus leaving a permanent record (figs. 3, 4).

Besides demonstrating the fragility of some historic resources, these and other fires have pointed out the need for HABS documentation of NPS historic buildings. The emphasis on Survey recording of NPS buildings reaffirms a Park Service management goal for cultural resources—to make available to the architectural community, the academic community, and the general public detailed, accurate information on the historic buildings entrusted to the Park Service's care.

Figure 1 Gunston Hall, Lorton vicinity, Fairfax County, Virginia. Drawing by Richard J. Cronenberger, 1981. (HABS VA–141, sheet 11 of 30 sheets)

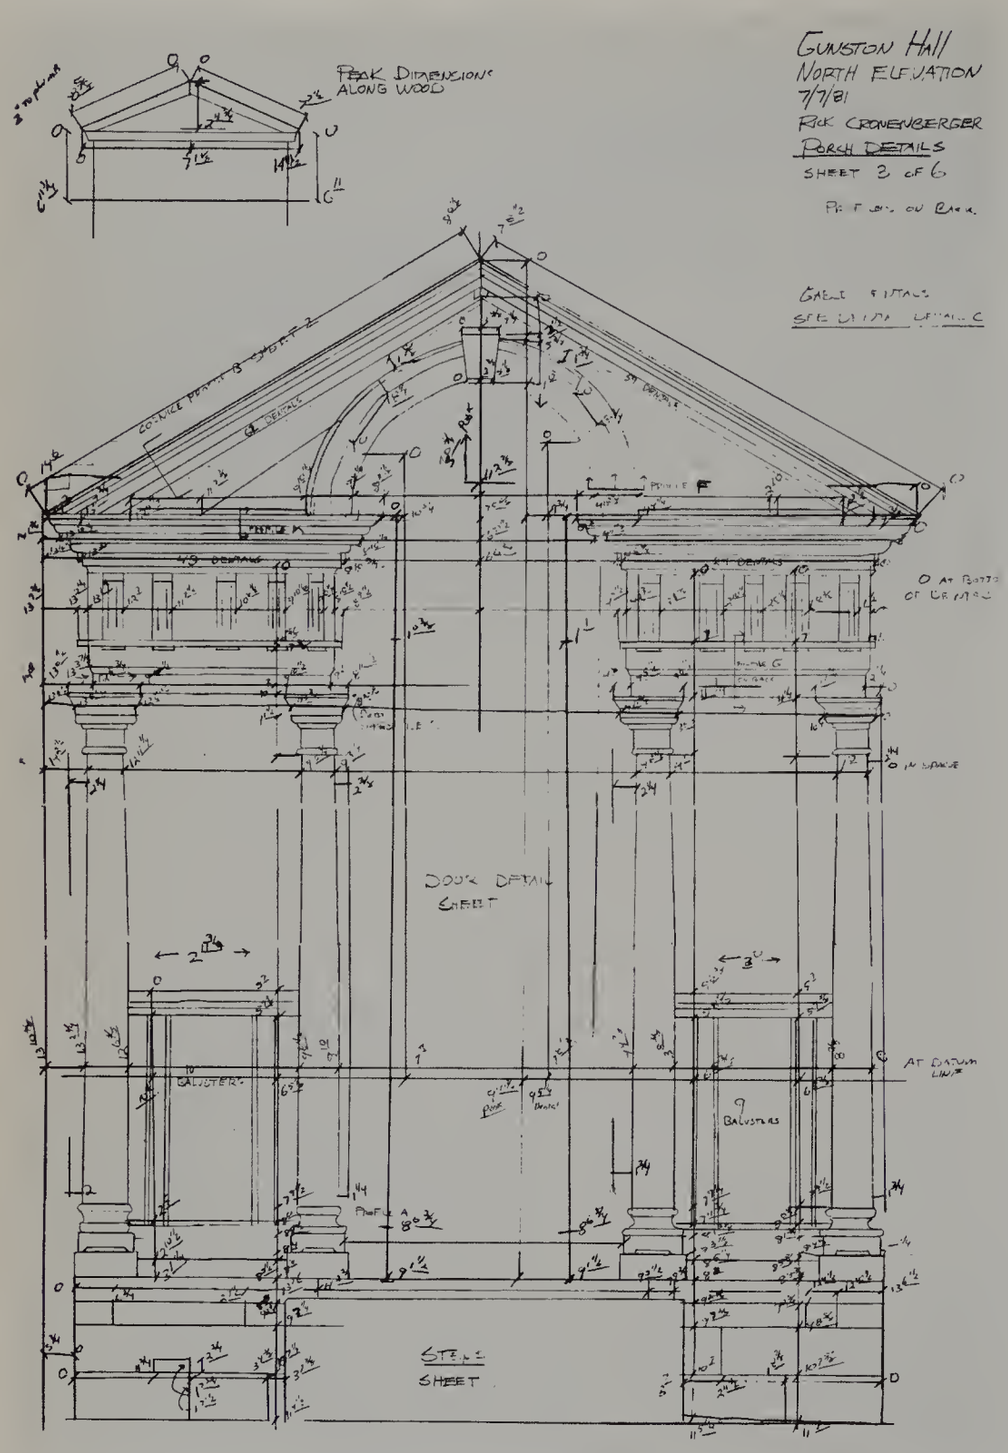

Figure 2 Measured drawings are developed from measurements recorded in field notebooks. From the information in the notebooks, the accuracy of the final drawing can be judged. Gunston Hall, north elevation, by Richard Cronenberger, 1981. (HABS field notebook, sheet 3 of 6 sheets)

To reorient HABS and HAER documentation projects to focus on Park Service historic buildings, HABS and HAER staff have undertaken a number of new recording projects in the last year. Surveys have been done for the Dorchester Heights Monument in Boston, the Elizabeth Cady Stanton House in Seneca Falls, New York, and the Frederick Law Olmsted House in Brookline, Massachusetts, and an inventory project was undertaken in Lake Clark, Alaska. HABS and HAER documentation projects for other NPS historic properties are expected to increase greatly in the next several years.

HABS and HAER programs are not being limited to the recording of National Park Service buildings. Park Service Director Russell Dickenson has also encouraged HABS and HAER to record national historic landmarks. This goal is being met in a number of ways. Gunston Hall, Virginia (fig. 1), is one example where private funds have been provided to support a HABS recording team. The focus on recording nationally significant buildings reflects the National Park Service's goal of making the HABS collection even more national in scope. This goal is being met in a number of ways. A recent agreement entered into by HABS/HAER with the U.S. Department of the Army provided HABS and HAER with more than one million dollars to do an inventory of over eighty army installations, recording to HABS/HAER standards all the nationally significant buildings on those installations.

Besides the change in emphasis to encourage the recording of nationally significant buildings, newer buildings are now being documented by HABS. Today HABS follows a fifty-year minimum age requirement in selecting historic buildings for documentation. In the 1930s, few buildings constructed after 1860 were documented. Later, HABS became involved in documenting buildings built between 1880 and 1930. The Adler and Sullivan Auditorium Building is one example (fig. 6).

In the 1970s, HABS became increasingly concerned with documenting not only the architecture of build-

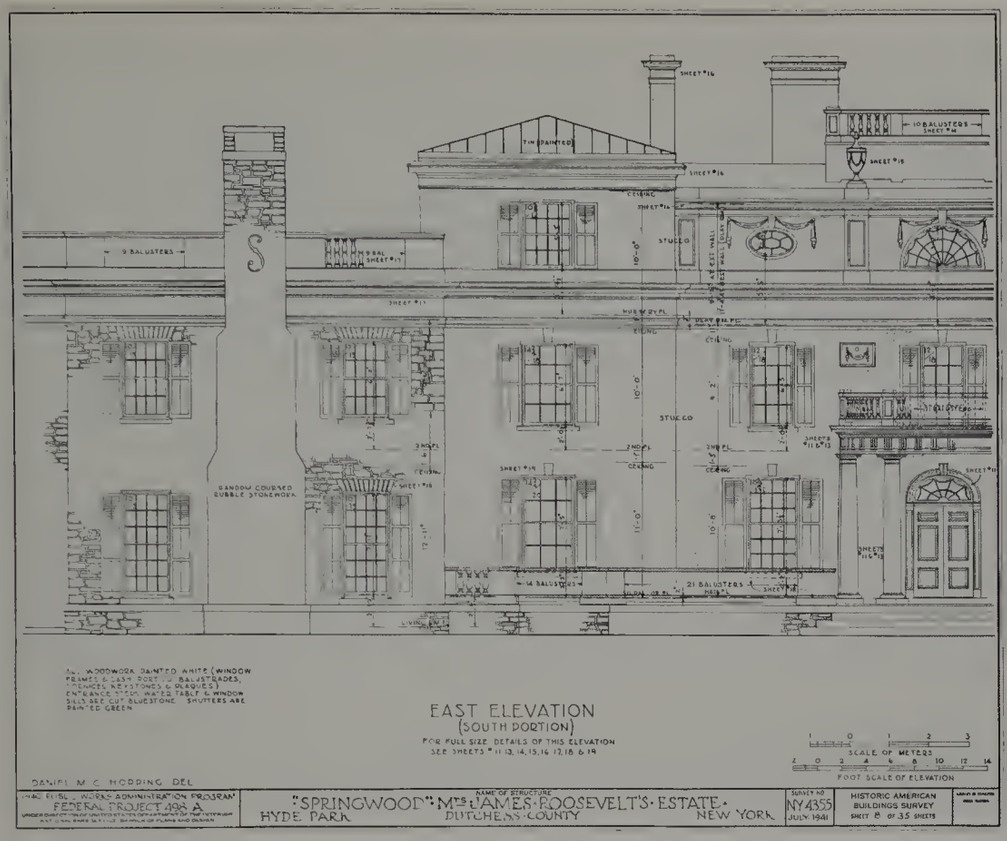

Figure 3 In 1940, HABS documented Franklin Roosevelt's birthplace in Hyde Park, New York. In 1982, fire and the water used to extinguish it damaged the central portion of this mansion. HABS drawings and photographs, made over forty years earlier, were used in making the restoration plans. ings but the engineering systems of certain structures as well. Beginning in the late nineteenth century, American buildings increasingly incorporated within their fabric features such as elevators, electrical power systems, heating, and air conditioning and ventilation systems. Simultaneously, more sophisticated structural systems began to be used in American buildings. To document such buildings adequately, it is necessary to document the engineering features as well as the architectural. Joint HABS/HAER projects are essential. The Adler and Sullivan Auditorium Building project, undertaken

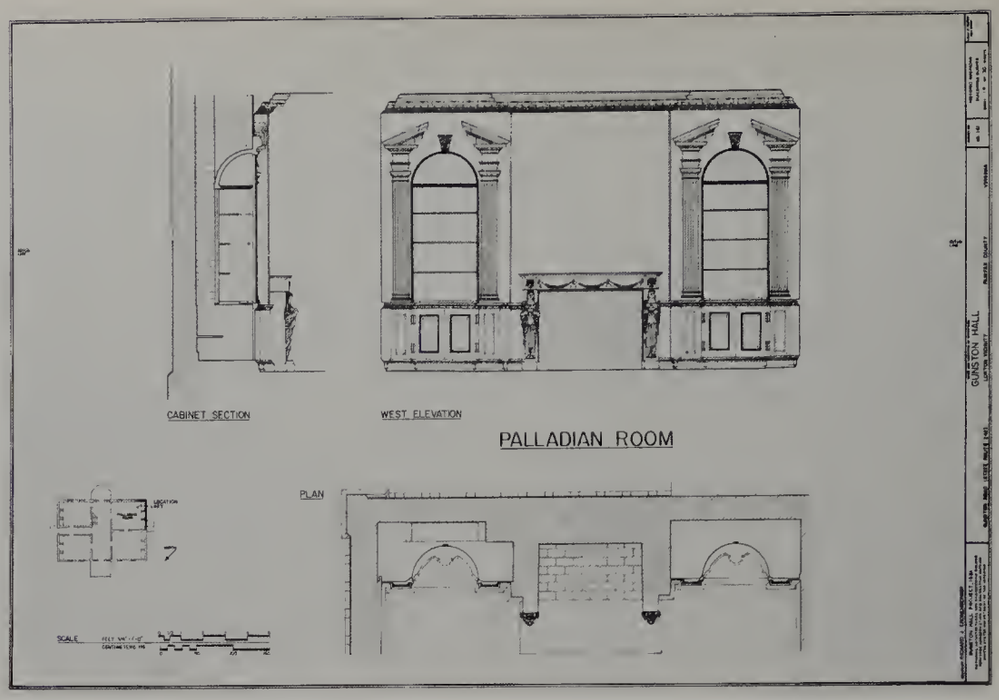

Figure 5 Palladian Room, Gunston Hall, Fairfax County, Virginia. The Palladian Room is considered William Buckland's masterpiece. With the return of the Historic American Buildings Survey and the Historic American Engineering Record to the National Park Service in 1981, more attention was given to the documentation of nationally significant buildings, such as Gunston Hall, a National Historic Landmark. in the summers of 1980 and 1981 under the supervision of HAER architect Donald Stevenson and HABS architect John Burns, with architect Rita Gorawara as field supervisor, is an example of the increase of such projects. The architectural features of this landmark building had been recorded in 1962 by HABS. The purpose of the 1980–81 project was to record the innovative structural and mechanical features of the Auditorium Building.

The techniques of recording are a second aspect of the HABS program that is changing. Although more reliance has been placed on photorecording—particularly formal photography and rectified photography—today than in the 1930s, photogrammetry has never become a standard recording technique for the HABS program. When used in HABS recording efforts, photogrammetry has always been done by contractors and only for buildings where hand measurement is difficult or impossible to do. There are several reasons for this. First, the cost of equipment is high—the stereoscopic camera alone costs thousands of dollars—and HABS has always been a sparsely funded program. Most funds, in fact, are used to pay summer team salaries. Second, HABS recording projects have served to train over one thousand architects, historians, and photographers—many of whom have entered the field of historic preservation as a result of their HABS experience. Photogrammetry, if used on a large scale, might diminish the training value of HABS summer projects.

Yet HABS must develop photogrammetric capability in the years ahead, particularly for emergency recording projects where there is not time for traditional, hand-measurement techniques. The acquisition of a stereoscopic camera is a necessary first step. This camera would produce stereopairs that could be deposited in the Library of Congress for later use in the production of measured drawings, if these were needed. I expect HABS to gain this type of capability in the very near future.

A third aspect of change is in the presentation of data collected on HABS recording projects. The Historic Preservation Amendment of 1980 (Public Law 96-515) calls upon the secretary of the interior to develop and promulgate standards for architectural and engineering recording. These standards, the first such formal standards for HABS and HAER, allowed the programs to review this documentation in light of the needs of HABS/ HAER users.

Surveys of users were conducted to find out how they were using HABS or HAER documentation and what they needed from it. The results were surprising. It was found that the HABS collection is used more than any other collection in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress, and its use continues to grow dramatically. It is extensively used by preservationists, architects, and engineers facing real-life preservation problems, as well as by academics, researchers, and the general public.

One of the uses of the HABS collections has been in book and magazine publishing, and HABS documentation had changed to favor this particular user group. HABS measured drawings once contained substantial line dimensions, assisting architects and engineers who needed exact measurements. Because these were visually distracting, most were eliminated over the last several decades so that drawings were suitable for publication (figs. 8, 9). The measuring stick, used to establish critical dimensions, was contained in many of the HABS photographs in the 1930s, but it was eliminated in later HABS shots. This resulted in photographs without intrusions but which contained less information for those interested in the details of the building under study.

In the HABS and HAER standards now being developed, an attempt at balance will be made. Although a return to the extensive line dimensions contained on the 1930s measured drawings may not be desirable, additional line dimensions are proposed for future HABS drawings. Measuring sticks may be used in some but not all of the photographic views of a building. Further, these standards propose

Figure 6 With the passage of time, more and newer buildings are being documented by the Historic American Buildings Survey. Adler and Sullivan's Auditorium Building would probably have been considered too new when HABS first started in 1933. Documented in 1980–81, it was one of the first examples of a joint Historic American Buildings Survey and Historic American Engineering Record project. Besides architectural features, innovative structural and mechanical aspects of this building were documented. Drawing by August Ventura, 1980. (HABS IL–1007, sheet 44 of 53 sheets)

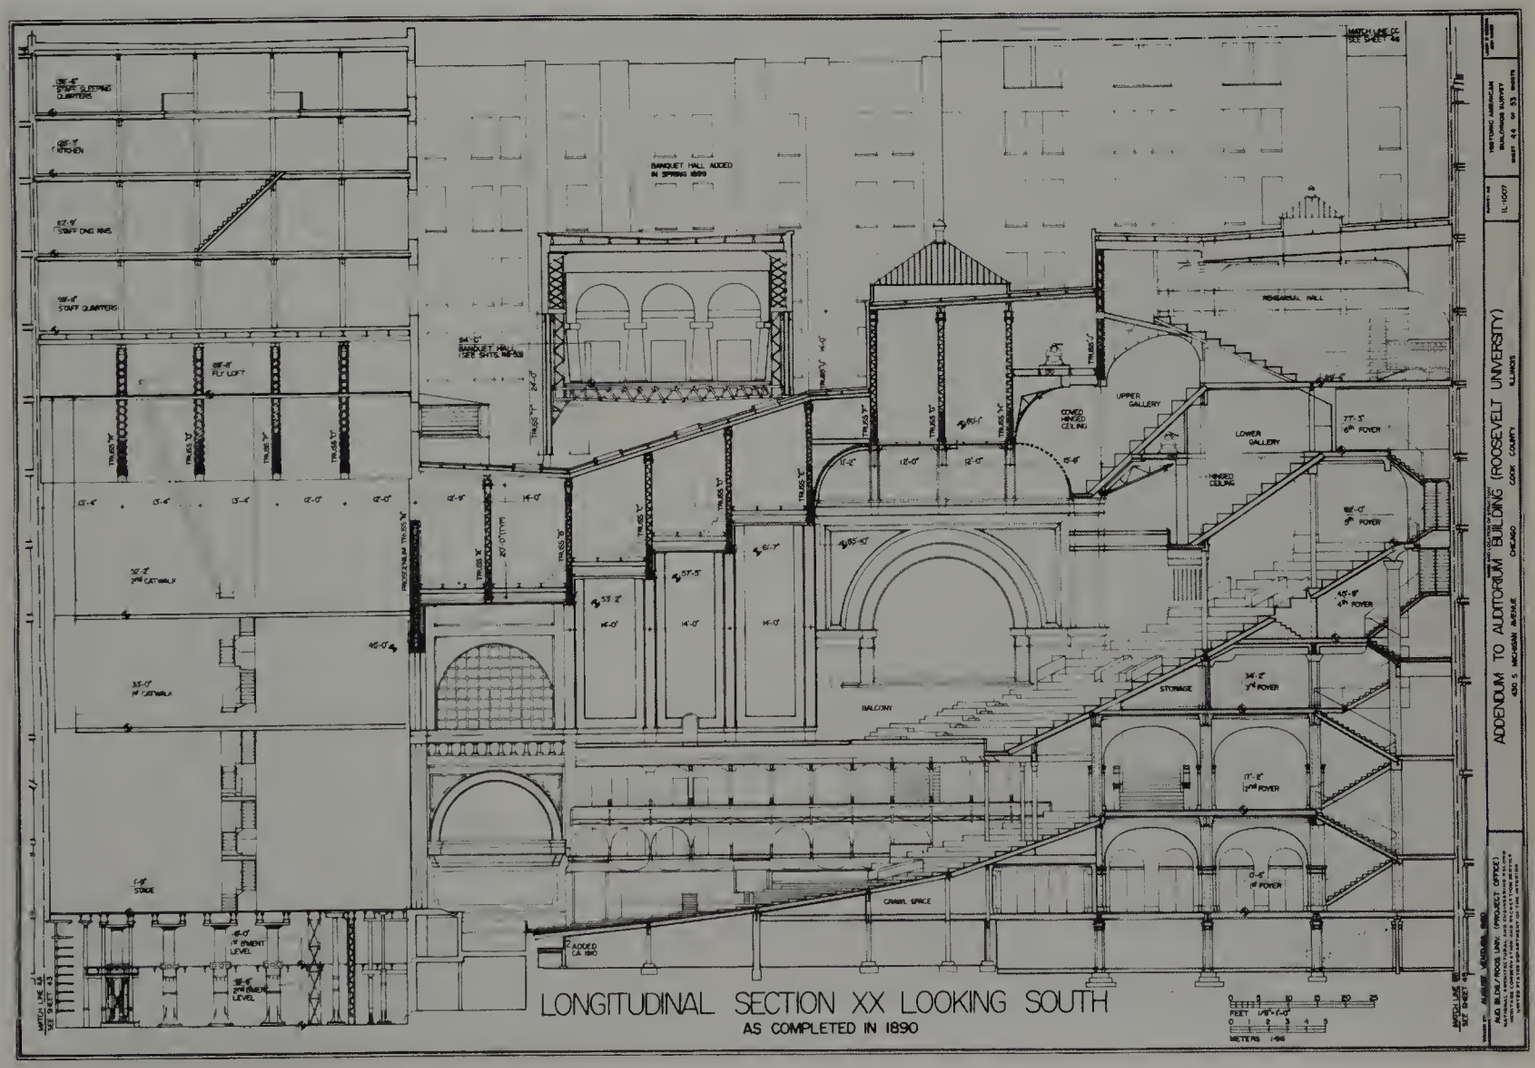

Figure 7 A measured drawing developed from photogrammetric studies shows the Pueblo of Taos, Taos County, New Mexico. Although HABS has used photogrammetry in the past through contracts with private firms, funds have not been available for the purchase of equipment that could make photogrammetry a regular part of the HABS program. establishing a series of levels, so that buildings judged especially significant, such as national historic landmarks, will receive more extensive documentation than less significant buildings.

In addition, both HABS and HAER will make more forms of documentation available to the user. Traditionally, the HABS/HAER user had only measured drawings, formal photographs, and written data from which to work on comprehensively documented buildings. Field notebooks, which recorded building dimensions and served as the basis for HABS measured drawings, were sometimes discarded once the HABS measured drawings were completed (fig. 9). Now these field notebooks are always transmitted to the Library of Congress where the HABS user can consult them. They frequently contain information pertaining to a building above and beyond what is included on the measured drawings. More importantly, the field notebooks can be used to validate the accuracy of the measured drawings, since the notebooks contain primary visual data. In the development of a HABS or HAER project, hundreds of 35-mm black-and-white photographs may be taken. These field photographs are used in making measured drawings. In the past, such photographs were discarded because they were not archivally stable. Yet they contained much valuable information. In the future, where practical, these field photographs will be transmitted to the Library of Congress, where they too will be made available to HABS and HAER users. Although field photographs will not meet normal HABS/ HAER standards of archival stability, they will provide years of service to HABS/ HAER users.

Figure 10 A barn in one of the many new national parks in Alaska will not be preserved but it has been recorded by HABS. Photograph by Jet Lowe.

A fourth aspect of change in the Survey is the development of HABS documentation intended to meet special purposes. In Alaska, for example, HABS recording projects are being used to permanently record historic vernacular buildings that cannot be preserved. Frequently, there is not sufficient preservation funding available to preserve every log cabin within a given park. In these cases, it is an appropriate preservation strategy to record what remains and allow the structure to return to its natural state. HABS is also investigating the use of HABS documentation for assessing the condition of historic buildings, particularly for studies over long periods of time to detect long-term degradation processes affecting a structure.

A fifth aspect of change in the program is in the delivery of HABS and HAER documentation to the user. The HABS and HAER collections are maintained in a single location— the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. Copies could be made available of all items within the HABS collection, but the cost of reproduction was naturally high for any but the most narrow of studies. Generally, if an individual wanted to use the collections, he had to travel to Washington, D.C.

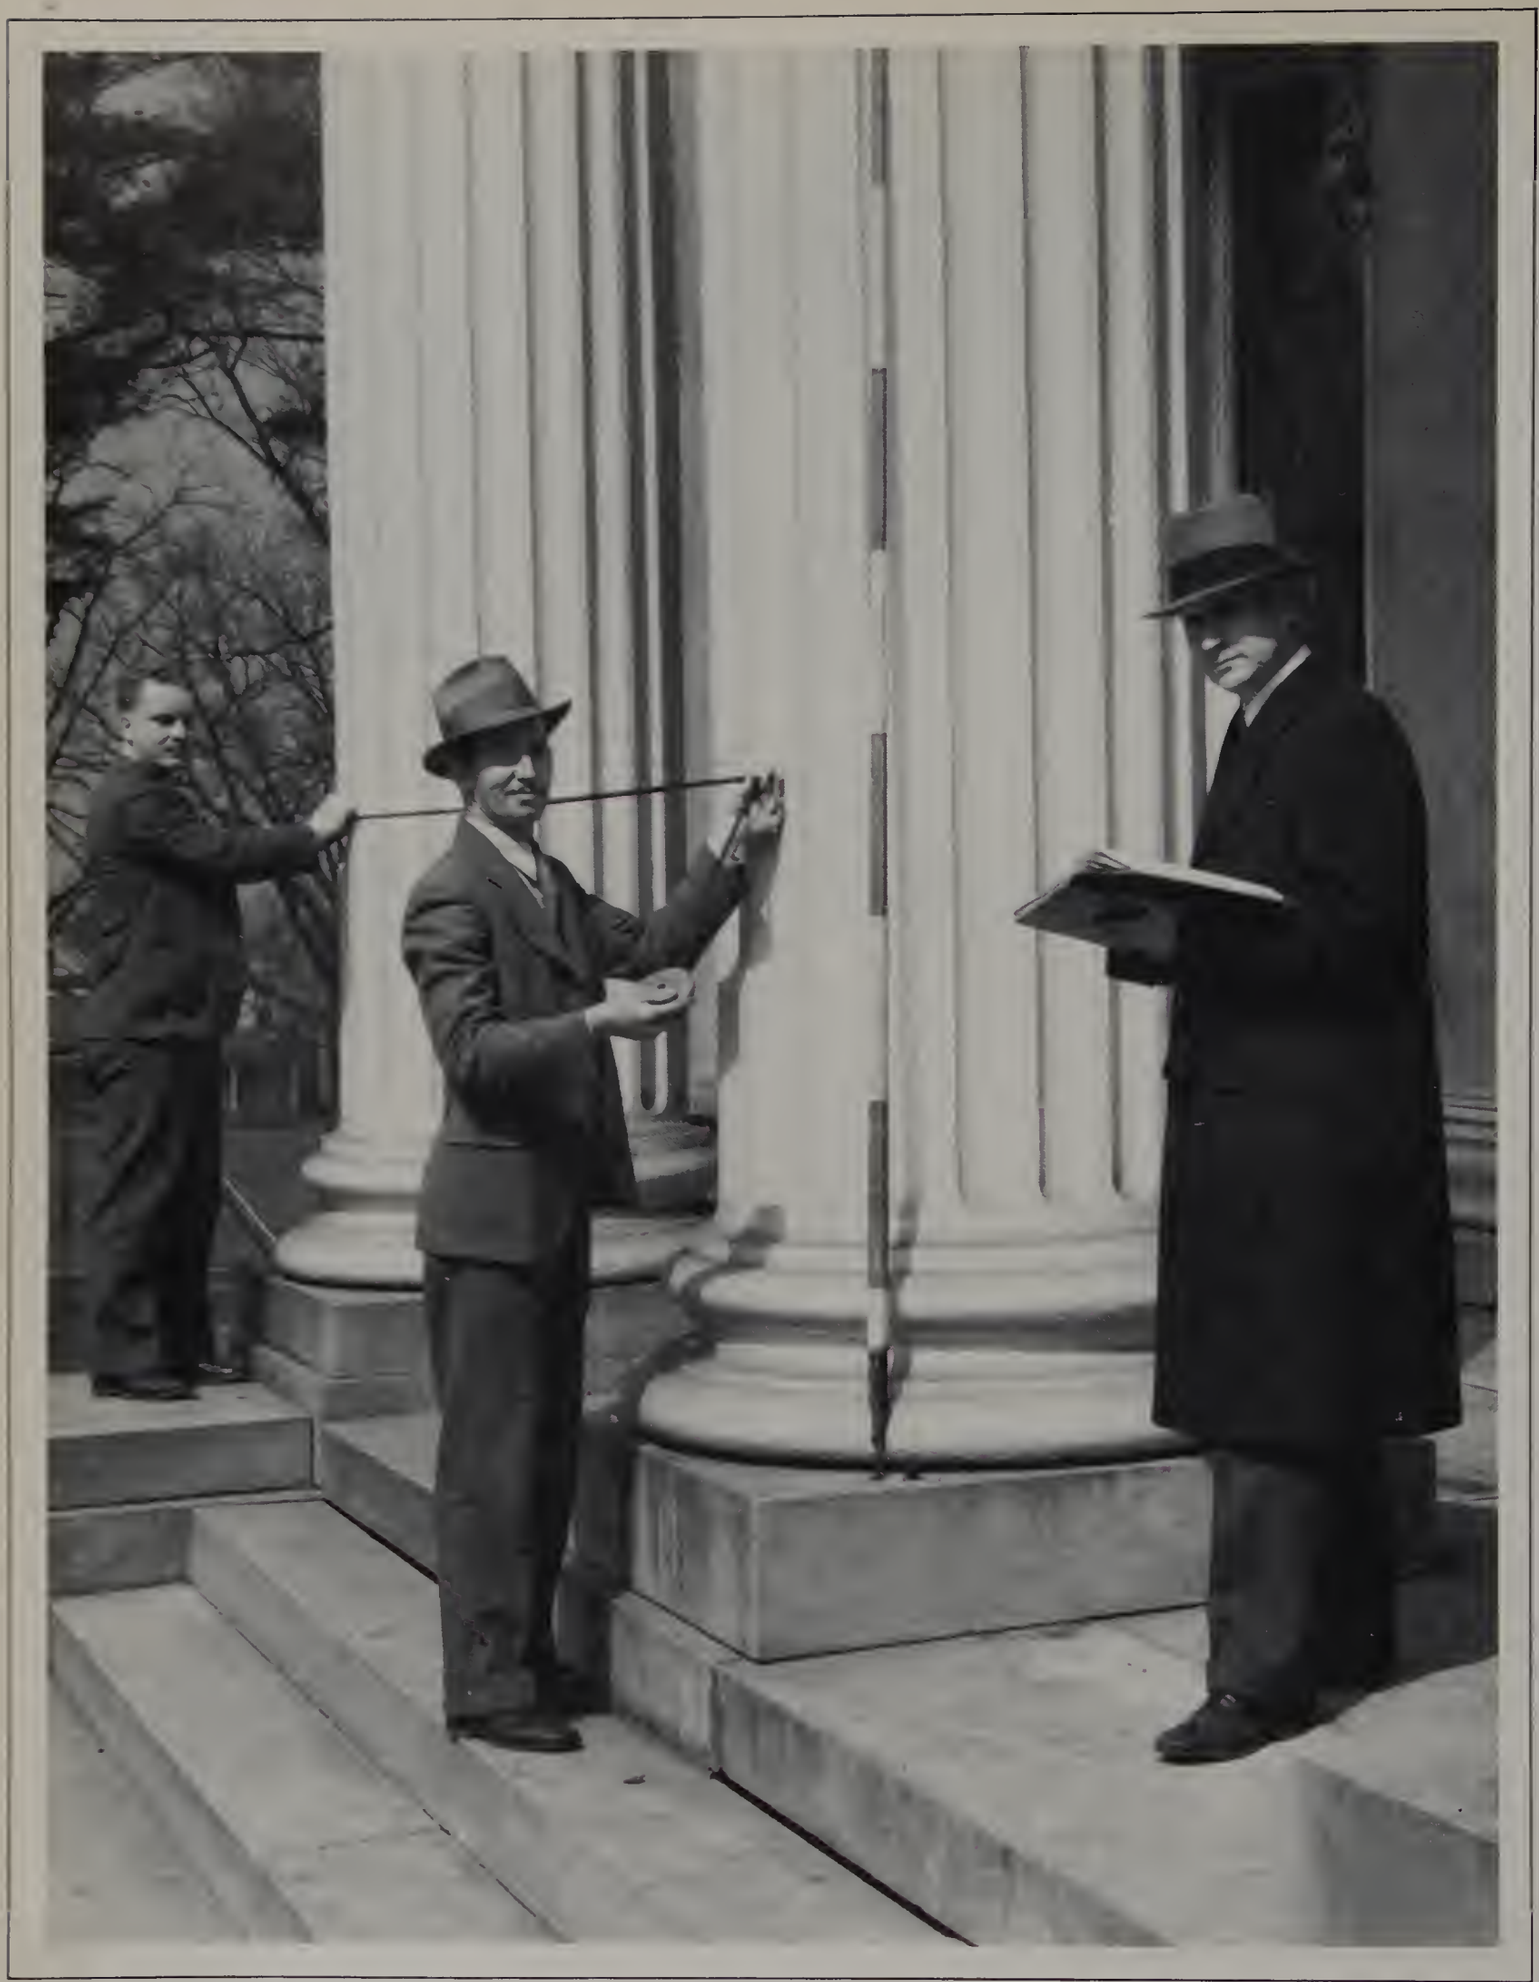

In 1982 the firm of Chadwyck-Healey, Ltd., published on microfiche all HABS photographs and data pages transmitted to the Library of Congress through 1979. Approximately eighty-five thousand images were thus made available to HABS users for purchase that same year. Coupled with a Library of Congress microfilm of HABS measured drawings, the HABS microfiche set makes the collections available at institutions throughout the United States for the fiftieth anniversary of the Historic American Buildings Survey. In conjunction with the anniversary, HABS/HAER is also offering its office file copies of photographs to state archives that agree to maintain the integrity of the collection and make it available to the public.

These developments—publications in microfiche and microfilm and the establishment of statewide HABS archives—will greatly increase the use of HABS documents. To use these collections effectively, however, requires an index. It is this need that Historic America is designed to meet.

The checklist in this book is the result of a HABS/HAER project to establish a computer data base containing information in the HABS/HAER catalogs. The results of the project, which was begun in 1982, provide the HABS user with the first comprehensive index to the HABS collections. But this is only the first product of the data base that was developed. In the future, the data base will be available to be queried—through computer terminals in the Prints and Photographs Division of the Library of Congress and in Park Service offices—by HABS users who want answers for specific questions. The data base developed contains much more information than published here. It will be used to develop specialized lists, such as updated state HABS listings and HAER indexes. It will also be used by HABS/HAER management to identify gaps in the HABS and HAER collections. This information will be used to develop priorities for future recording programs.

HABS and its sister program HAER continue to change. In the future, expected changes will not be random but will be designed to meet users' needs and respond to opportunities facing these programs.

The Checklist of Buildings, Structures, and Sites

Using the Checklist

by

ALICIA STAMM

Since 1933 the goal of the Historic American Buildings Survey (HABS) has been not only to document our nation's significant historic architecture but also to make this documentation available to the largest possible audience. It is to assist in this latter purpose that a comprehensive listing of sites and structures recorded by HABS over the last fifty years is presented here. The checklist encompasses the collections of both HABS and the Historic American Engineering Record (HAER), which was formed in 1969 to document nationally significant engineering sites. The collections include architectural measured drawings, large-format photographs, and written historical data. The checklist is not a complete catalog but a basic list generated from a complete, computerized data base that will be amended and updated on a regular basis to reflect the changing scope of the collections and needs of their users.

This checklist is the first comprehensive guide to both the HABS and HAER collections and reflects documentation received and processed by both offices of the National Park Service as of January 1, 1982. The HABS and HAER collections are combined in one list because they complement each other and in fact often overlap. Before 1969, HABS documented many sites and structures that were of interest because of technological or engineering features rather than architectural ones. For every entry in the checklist, either a HABS or a HAER number is given, and sometimes both appear, when material related to a structure was obtained through both surveys.

The need for a single listing of the collections has been great. A comprehensive catalog of the HABS collection has not been compiled since 1941. A supplement to that complete catalog was published in 1959. Together these two volumes list 7,888 buildings, fewer than half the number included in this checklist. A catalog for the HAER collection was published in 1976. Information on more recent acquisitions to the collections has been available only through some state catalogs and card catalogs maintained at the National Park Service and Library of Con-

This HABS photograph is unusual in that it shows the members of a 1930s recording team in the act of measuring a building, the Kentucky School for the Blind in Louisville, Kentucky. The architects documenting this Greek Revival portico are unidentified, but thousands like them have participated in the last fifty years in recording the almost seventeen thousand sites and structures found in the checklist published here. gress in Washington, D.C. The present checklist includes 16,738 entries for fifty states and three territories of the United States. It is hoped that this single volume will serve architects, engineers, planners, university students and faculty, other professionals, and the general public across the country in giving them access to the drawings, photographs, and written data that make up the HABS and HAER collections.

Arrangement

The arrangement of the checklist follows the geographic arrangement of the records held at the Library of Congress. The checklist is arranged alphabetically first by state (or territory), second by county (or, in the case of Louisiana, by parish), and third by city or nearest vicinity. Independent cities, however, do not have a county entry and are arranged alphabetically at the beginning of the state. If a rural structure is not in the vicinity of a city or town, it appears alphabetically at the beginning of the appropriate county listing. Individual entries are then arranged alphabetically within a geographic location by the historic name of the structure or by the most prominent name of the structure as listed at the Library of Congress. Since many structures have more than one name, secondary names are given following the main entry. Each secondary name is also listed in its alphabetical sequence as a cross-reference entry that will refer the reader back to the main entry. If a structure does not have a historic name, its street address followed by the building type becomes the name, for example "301 Elm Street (House)" or "5000 Main Street (Commercial Building)." If a building is in a rural location and there is no specific address available, it is listed simply by building type, for example, "Maryland, Harford County, Stockton vicinity, Farm House."

Structures that are located within a historic district or a complex are listed following the main entry giving the district or complex name. In the case of a designated historic district, the structure name appears as a secondary name to the main entry—for example, the "Ufford, E. L., Building" appears under the "Strand Historic District" under Galveston, Galveston County, Texas. Complexes represent smaller groupings of related buildings, and for these both the name of the complex and the names of individual buildings are listed as part of a main entry, as in "Pennsylvania, Philadelphia County, Philadelphia, Fort Mifflin, Commissary" or "Massachusetts, Barnstable County, Barnstable, Lombard Farm, Barn." When documentation is available on only a portion of a structure or on an architectural detail only, a notation appears in parentheses following the proper name of the house to indicate this. An example is "Cooper, Thomas, House (Doorway)."

The building name (or names) is followed by the address. The address is not repeated if it is listed as the name of the structure in the main entry. If a structure has been moved, a parenthetical note follows the address stating that the structure has been either "moved to" or "moved from" another address and gives the appropriate two-letter state abbreviation and city or town. Moved structures are not cross-referenced but are entered twice, once under each location. If a structure has been moved within a city, however, it appears only once, with the alternate street address following either "moved to" or "moved from."

After the address, the HABS number or HAER number (or sometimes both) is given, followed by symbols indicating the types of documentation existing for the structure—drawings, photographs, or data—and the location of the documentation—either at the HABS/HAER office or at the Library of Congress.

Alphabetizing

Structures are listed alphabetically by the building name, for instance, "Chesterfield Blacksmith Shop." Personal names that have become part of a building name are listed with the last name first, then the first name, and then the descriptive building type, as in "Eddy, Zachariah, Law Office." If there is a rank or title attached to a name, it is entered following the surname but preceding the Christian name, and the name is alphabetized accordingly, for example, "Potter, Capt. John, House."

When an address is the name of the building, the entry is alphabetized by the street name. If the street name is numerical, it is spelled out in full, as in "1919 Twenty-first Street (House)," and alphabetized accordingly ("Twenty-first" coming under T). If a street name is preceded by "North," "South," "East," or "West," it is alphabetized first by that designation.

Descriptive adjectives—such as "Old," "Stone," or "Brick"—follow the name of the building, as in "Courthouse, Old," "House, Brick," or "Barn, Stone." Articles also follow the name of the structure, except when the name is a foreign one, for example, "Friends School, The" and "El Polvrin."

Sample Entry and Abbreviations

The elements of the sample entry and the abbreviations used are explained in the box on page 291 in sequence as they appear in the checklist.

Future Needs

This checklist of the HABS and HAER collections is meant to fulfill not only the current, urgent need for a single comprehensive list that is published and widely distributed but future needs as well. The checklist was completed from catalogs and data currently existing in the HABS/HAER office and at the Library of Congress. Data were entered into an automated computer system that will continue in use as the basis for future cataloging. The use of a computer system offers great advantages for the future management of the collections. It also has, however, some slight disadvantages. For instance, exceptions must be treated in a standard manner. Thus, territories appear as states, parishes as counties, and boroughs or townships as cities or towns in this published checklist. Certain proper names of structures had to be abbreviated to fit within the number of characters allotted for them in the computer record.

Much of the information contained in the collections has not been updated since the 1930s and 1940s when the records were first created. Since it was not possible to make on-site visits to documented structures, we ask you, the researcher, to inform us of changes. Using the automated data base, HABS/HAER staff will revise and amend information to improve and refine the collections, making their future as promising as their past has been valuable. Incorrect or outdated information found in the checklist should be reported to the Historic American Buildings Survey/Historic American Engineering Record, National Park Service, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. 20240.

Index to County by City

The arrangement of cities and towns within the checklist is alphabetical by county. This index lists all cities and towns in the checklist by state and indicates the county in which they are located. Independent cities—those cities that are legally separate from any county— precede county listings in the checklist. They appear in the index without a reference to a county name.
